CAIRO (Agencies) — Syria will retaliate with chemical weapons if Israel ever uses nuclear weapons, Syria's ambassador to Egypt, Issa Darwish, told the government weekly Al-Ahram on Wednesday. "The response will be severe if Israel goes further in its threats to strike Syria with nuclear weapons," Mr. Darwish was quoted as saying by Al-Ahram. "Damascus will respond by using chemical weapons and Syria is now preparing to face up to any Israeli threat," the newspaper reported him as saying. Israeli officials said this month that Syria was producing chemical weapons with help from Russia. Israel is believed to have at least 200 nuclear warheads, although the Jewish state has not admitted to having them.

Bahrain will not attend GCC summit

MANAMA (AFP) — Bahrain said Wednesday it would boycott a Gulf Arab summit in Qatar next month amid a border dispute between the two countries and Doha's support for Manama's political opposition. Bahrain's foreign minister, Sheikh Mohammad bin Mubarak Al Khalifa, said his country will stay away from the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) summit because "of several non-brotherly and non-amicable activities" Qatar has undertaken against Bahrain.

NATO to renew mandate in Bosnia

BRUSSELS (AFP) — North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO) ambassadors on Wednesday agreed that the post-implementation peacekeeping force (IFOR) in Bosnia should be committed to the region until mid-1998, as the United States proposed, a NATO official said. "Everyone has agreed to plan on the basis of an 18-month mandate," the official said. The mandate of the current 60,000-strong IFOR expires on Dec. 20. It will be replaced by a stabilisation force of about 31,000 men.

Israel satisfied with Lebanon truce panel

TEL AVIV (AFP) — Israel voiced satisfaction on Wednesday with the international ceasefire monitoring committee set up in South Lebanon after Israel's offensive in April against Iranian-backed Hizbollah guerrillas. "In our eyes, the committee amply justifies its creation," the coordinator for Israeli activities in South Lebanon, Uri Lubrani, told AFP. Mr. Lubrani said he hoped the committee set up six months ago would "continue to do its work with the same seriousness and success."

Ghali sole candidate for Africa — Musa

CAIRO (AFP) — Egypt on Wednesday stressed that Boutros Ghali, who is seeking a second term, was Africa's only candidate for the race. "There is only one candidate for Africa and he is Mr. Boutros Ghali," Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Musa told reporters. Mr. Musa, who said consultations were still underway at the U.N. Security Council, was replying to a journalist who asked him if the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) had another candidate.

U.N. panel adopts pricing mechanism for Iraqi oil exports

Movement is fast for implementing deal; Anbari expects oil flow to start Dec. 10

UNITED NATIONS (Agencies) — A U.N. committee on Wednesday approved a formula for setting the price of Iraqi oil, a major political hurdle standing in the way of the final go-ahead allowing Baghdad to resume oil exports for the first time in six years.

Also Wednesday, the U.N. staff submitted an interim report to the Security Council outlining procedures for exports and distribution of food and medicine purchased with oil revenues.

Both steps signalled the United Nations was moving forward rapidly to implement the plan under which Iraq can sell $2 billion worth of oil for an initial 180-day period to buy food and medicine for its people suffering the effects of international sanctions. An Iraqi negotiator said his country was set to resume oil exports on Dec. 10, initially at the rate of 500,000 barrels a day, following the U.N. green light for the oil-for-food deal. "As soon as contracts have been signed with oil companies, we will begin exporting, which should all happen by Dec. 10 at the latest," negotiator Abdul Amir Al Anbari said in Paris. Baghdad will export "about a half million barrels per day, if oil prices stay at their current high level," he said. "Everything will depend on the price of crude and quantities on the market."

exporting $2 billion worth of oil every six months, in order to buy food and medicine to help its sanctions-hit people.

Under the terms of the resolution, the oil-for-food deal comes into force the day after U.N. Secretary General Boutros Ghali informs the U.N. Security Council that all preparations have been completed. Iraq will sign contracts with France's Total, as well as British and U.S. oil firms, said Mr. Anbari.

The United Nations banned Iraqi exports as part of an economic embargo imposed after Baghdad invaded Kuwait in 1990. The measures devastated Iraq's oil-based economy.

Last May, Iraq accepted a U.N. offer allowing for limited oil sales under international supervision. But the plan was never implemented because of technical issues, differences with Iraq over interpretation and Baghdad's military incursion into protected Kurdish areas of the

Israel drops demand for written guarantee for 'hot pursuit'; Arafat insists on dates for further moves

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM (AP) — Negotiators made some progress on a Hebron accord Wednesday after Israel dropped a demand for written guarantees that its troops will be allowed to chase suspects into Palestinian-controlled areas of the city.

However, Yasser Arafat is not yet ready to sign an agreement, said Ahmad Tibi, an adviser to the Palestinian leader.

Arafat wants a written promise from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that Israeli troops will withdraw from most West Bank rural areas over the next year, with timetables attached to the pullback stages, Mr. Tibi told the Associated Press.

The key sticking point in two months of negotiations has been Israel's demand that its troops be allowed to operate in the neighbourhoods that are to come under Palestinian control if they consider it necessary in order to prevent attacks on Israelis. Mr. Netanyahu aide David Bar-Illan said Wednesday that Israel has dropped its initial demand for a written guarantee on the freedom of movement for troops in Hebron.

Instead, Israel agrees that the same terms on troop movements will apply to Hebron as in the West Bank and Gaza areas under full Palestinian control, Mr. Bar-Illan said. "We can apply what exists in the Oslo agreements in reference to other areas where Israel has the right to go on," Mr. Bar-Illan said, referring to the autonomy accords already signed.

The autonomy accords are vague on when Israeli troops have the right to enter so-called "a" areas that are under full Palestinian control.

In the past, there have been several such incidents, including when Palestinians fired at Israeli troops at an outpost in the Gaza Strip and the soldiers chased the assailants into the "a" area.

In general, Israeli soldiers have been careful not to enter Palestinian areas, even when they knew that a suspect in an attack on Israelis has sought refuge there.

Mr. Tibi said Wednesday that Israeli troops were not allowed to reenter areas of Hebron from which they have already withdrawn.

"No Israeli soldiers will be allowed to enter liberated Palestinian areas," Mr. Tibi said. Israeli and Palestinian negotiators also remained at odds Wednesday over the fate of downtown Shuhada street, which links several of the settler enclaves. The street was closed to Palestinian motorists after the 1994 massacre of 29 Muslim worshippers by a Jewish settler in Hebron.

Palestinians demand that the street be reopened immediately after Israeli troops redeploy. "We will not agree on an agreement which does not open the Shuhada street, which is a life line for Hebron," Mr. Tibi said.

Israel has said the street should remain closed for security reasons.

Despite the remaining difficulties, Mr. Netanyahu was optimistic and has asked Education Minister Zevulun Hammer to postpone a trip abroad so he could be present for a cabinet vote on the emerging agreement, the Israeli daily Yediot Ahronot said.

Israeli abuse of Palestinians widespread — Ben-Yair

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM (AFP) — Mistreatment of Palestinians by Israeli border policemen is widespread, according to a report by attorney general Michael Ben-Yair published Wednesday by the newspaper Yediot Aharonot.

"This is a phenomenon and not something extraordinary," Mr. Ben-Yair said. "This phenomenon damages our moral integrity in the eyes of the world... and we must do everything possible to stamp it out."

Publication of the summary came a week after Israeli television broadcast a 45-minute video showing two border policemen repeatedly kicking, slapping and abusing six Palestinian labourers caught trying to enter the Jerusalem area from Ramallah without permits.

A Jerusalem court on Tuesday ordered the conditional release of the two border policemen, David Ben Abu, 20, and Tzahi Shmaya, 19, who have been charged with aggravated assault and abuse of power.

The court ordered the defendants released on $2,800 bail and placed under house arrest until their trial. No date for the # Development of Jordan Valley is a priority, Regent tells area's residents

AMMAN (J.T.) — His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hassan, the Regent, on Wednesday visited the Damiya and Dahr Al Ramel districts in the central Jordan Valley region where he addressed the Abbad tribes about the development projects underway in their region.

Thanks to these projects and others carried out so far, the central Jordan Valley has been transformed into a booming area, attracting residents and more investments, the Regent told a public rally.

The major schemes to be implemented in the Jordan Rift Valley, including water projects, the Regent said, will cost $3 billion. He stressed that Jordan gives due priority to water resources and water use in the valley.

The government seeks to carry out development projects in all regions without any discrimination, said Prince Hassan, who urged the local authorities to adopt cropping systems suitable for producing high quality products.

He said efforts should be made to solve problems facing agricultural production and marketing of produce, pointing out that Jordan is receiving assistance from the European Union and other parties to develop farming.

Referring to the development of the Balqa region which includes the central Jordan Valley, Prince Hassan cited the planned Balqa Applied University and private colleges in the region as marking the educational development there. With reference to the problem of Palestinian refugees, some of whose camps are in Balqa Governorate, the Regent expressed hope that there would be no reduction of services to the camps. Jordan's delegation to next month's meeting of donor nations will stress that reduction will cause serious concern to Jordan, he said. The Regent paid tribute to the Jordanian Armed Forces for their role in the overall development of the country, especially in land reclamation.

Deputies representing Balqa Governorate and local officials attended the rally, during which notable delivered addresses pledging allegiance to the Hashemite Throne.

House finalises reply to King's speech; Ammarin's resignation is unaddressed

By Sa'eda Kilani
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — The Lower House of Parliament met on Wednesday to discuss and finalise items related to the opening of its last ordinary session but failed to discuss a thorny issue in its agenda: the resignation of Karak Deputy Nazeem Ammarin.

Deputies discussed and endorsed the House's reply to the speech from the Throne, approved the formation of the House's 14 committees (see page 12) and started preparations for the Arab-European parliamentary conference that is expected to be held here on Saturday.

However, there was no time left after the four-hour long session for debating the issue of Dr. Ammarin, who had submitted his resignation in protest of the government's handling of the unrest in his city last August.

Dr. Ammarin presented his resignation to the House following the riots in the south after the government's decision to lift bread subsidy. Dr. Ammarin cited at the time "verbal threats" from

Prime Minister Abdul Karim Kubarji as the reason behind his resignation, insisting that his resignation was not personal.

Several weeks after his resignation, the National Action Front bloc, which groups 19 deputies at the House, announced it was accepting Dr. Ammarin's resignation and will approve it at the House.

It was yet not clear whether the House's majority would accept the deputy's resignation. But the House witnessed all morning Wednesday continuous talks and mediation among parliamentarians.

Deputies Taher Masri, Suleiman Sa'ad, Fawzi Tueimeh and others were seen talking to Deputy Ammarin, who, by the end of the session looked extremely worn out. If the resignation was accepted by the House, it will be considered as a precedent. And by-elections will be held in Karak within 45 days of the House announcement.

Deputy Ammarin told the Jordan Times it was up to the House to decide on the issue since it was too late for him to withdraw. He said he will defend himself if his resignation come under discussion.

Deputies' discussions of the House's reply to the Speech from the Throne, which will be read by Speaker Sa'ad Hayel Sour before His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hassan, the Regent, on Saturday, concentrated at the outset on the phrasing of certain clauses in the reply but took a different turn later when the issue of separation between the legislative and executive powers was brought up. In his speech from the throne at the opening of Parliament last week, His Majesty King Hussein called for an in-depth study of the introduction of the "Norwegian law" that disallows deputies from holding ministerial portfolios.

Leftist Deputy Toujan Faisal claimed that such a change necessitates an amendment in the Constitution. An argument that was outrightly countered by centrist Deputy Abdul Raouf Rawabdeh who noted that the Constitution "allows and does not enforce" prime ministers to include deputies in their cabinets. There is no need for amending the Constitution nor is the time ripe for opening discussions on the subject," he said. "In the final analysis, the government has the final say."

But Islamic Action Front (IAF) Deputy Bassam Emoush insisted on raising the issue in the House's reply. The discussion came to an end when speaker Sour said: "The issue is not up for discussion. It is up to the prime minister to decide whether he wants to appoint deputies in his government or not."

On Saturday, the annual Arab-European parliamentary conference will start here with the participation of delegations from 160 countries. Discussions are expected to focus on the activation of the Arab-Israeli peace process, the enhancement of the European role and sanctions on three Arab countries. The conference will also tackle terrorism, and Arab-European partnership.

Hans Klein, friend of Jordan — 1931-1996

AMMAN (J.T.) — The vice president of the German Bundestag (parliament) and former federal minister of economic cooperation, Hans Klein, passed away in Bonn on Nov. 26, following a severe heart attack. He was 65.

Mr. Klein was a friend of Jordan and a good friend of many Jordanian personalities and had served on the staff of the German embassy in Amman in the mid-sixties and other German embassies in the region. Mr. Klein visited Jordan several times. His last visit was in October last year at the head of a large parliamentary delegation. During his last visit Mr.

Hans Klein

Klein met the speakers and members of Parliament to review Middle East peace and bilateral relations.

Mr. Klein is survived by his wife and three sons.

No more free telephone calls for civil servants

By a Jordan Times Staff Reporter

AMMAN — A decision to withdraw all telephone lines given to government employees as well as members of the Council of Ministers in recognition of their official status was taken in view of the privatisation of the state-owned telecommunications company, official sources said Wednesday.

The decision was announced on Tuesday by Telecommunications Minister Jamal Sarairah, who is also chairman of the National Telecommunications Company, in a statement carried by the Jordan News Agency, Petra.

The withdrawal of lines — estimated to run into several thousands — takes effect on Jan. 1, 1997. Telephone lines obtained by civil servants and ministers in their private capacity are not expected to be affected by the move because they settle the related bills themselves.

"It simply means no more free telephone calls for civil servants as of the beginning of next year," said an official source.

Exemptions from the cancellation of lines will be made only under specific recommendations made by the prime minister — meaning that the government will settle the bills to the National Telecommunications Company, the former Telecommunications

Palestinians to boycott most multilateral talks

OCUPPIED JERUSALEM (R) — The Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) will boycott most multilateral peace talks to protest Israel's delay in implementing PLO-Israel interim peace deals signed last year. PLO officials said on Tuesday.

"The Palestinian National Authority (PNA) decided...that its delegations will boycott all multilateral talks, except those tackling the refugees issue, as a protest against lack of progress in bilateral peace talks as a result of Israel's lack of seriousness in implementing interim accords," Jamil Al Tarifi, Palestinian minister of civil affairs, told Reuters.

Palestinians fear Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who ousted Israel's previous centre-left government in May elections, is bent on scrapping the peace process based on trading occupied Arab land for peace.

Mr. Netanyahu, who opposes trading land for peace, says he will nonetheless implement agreements signed between the PLO and Israel's former government.

On Tuesday, Mr. Netanyahu paid his first official visit to a Jewish settlement in the West Bank in a show of defiance to Palestinians opposed to his policy of expanding such outposts.

Mr. Netanyahu, who opposes creation of a Palestinian state, has approved building thousands of new homes in the settlements.

"What you don't understand that there were elections in Israel? The Arab World doesn't understand that there were elections in Israel?...And why not develop communities here?" Mr. Netanyahu said to reporters.

PLO officials said the boycott would last until progress is achieved in talks on implementing signed agreements on issues such as Israel's handover of most of Hebron and further West Bank redeployments and dates were set for resumption of final status peace talks.

Multilateral talks on five topics — economic cooperation, water, the environment, arms control and refugees — have been held since the Middle East peace talks were launched between Israel and the Palestinians.

Syria, Lebanon and Jordan in 1991. Syria and Lebanon from the outset boycotted the multilateral forums saying Israel should not be integrated into the region until there was progress in the bilateral negotiations.

PLO negotiator Hassan Asfour said co-sponsors of the peace process, the United States and Russia, as well as Europe and Arab states — all of which participate in the multilateral — had been notified of the PNA's decision.

Role of UNRWA and crisis facing it emphasised at special committee talks

NEW YORK — The United Nations General Assembly has completed the first stage in its annual consideration of the United Nations Relief and Work Agency's (UNRWA) work when the assembly's Special Political and Decolonisation Committee (Fourth Committee) concluded a two-day debate on the agency's activities on behalf of 3.3 million Palestinian refugees.

The committee annually reviews the work of UNRWA and submits a report and draft resolutions for approval by the General Assembly, which established the agency in December 1949 as a temporary measure to provide humanitarian assistance to the Palestine refugees.

This year's debate opened on Nov. 22 with the presentation by UNRWA Commissioner-General Peter Hansen of his annual report to the General Assembly. The committee then heard statements from the representatives of 27 national delegations, from the European Union and 11 associated countries and from the observers of Palestine, Switzerland and the Holy See.

The debate was marked by unanimous support for the work of the UNRWA, particularly in the difficult circumstances confronting the refugees in the Gaza Strip, West Bank and Lebanon. There were also expressions of concern about the critical financial situation of the agency, which faces an estimated 1996 budget deficit of $11.7 million, plus a shortage of $3.9 million to complete the financing of the relocation of UNRWA's headquarters from Vienna to the region during the year.

Speakers also expressed grave concern about the constraints hindering the work of the agency — and the hardships suffered by the refugees — as a consequence of the protracted closures imposed by the Israeli authorities on the residents of the Palestinian self-rule areas.

While commending the commissioner-general and his staff for the efforts they were making to improve the accountability of the agency through a dialogue with donors, improved financial transparency and management reforms, many speakers said that UNRWA's very existence, and therefore the security and welfare of the refugees, was threatened by the structural deficit caused by a shortfall of voluntary contributions to UNRWA's budget. It was repeatedly stressed that it was up to the international community to provide the agency with the resources it required to carry out its vital work, and that the continuation of UNRWA's humanitarian services to the refugees was a crucial element in the Middle East peace process.

Nasser Al Kidwa, permanent observer of Palestine to the United Nations, recalled how UNRWA had played a crucial role over the years in preventing the exacerbation of the human catastrophe which had affected the Palestine refugees and had greatly helped in providing the necessary relief and education for generations of refugees. "Today, UNRWA still performs valuable work, and such work should continue in all fields of operations until a definitive solution to the problem is reached," he said.

A statement issued by the United States noted how the U.S., the largest single donor country to the agency, was pleased with the progress towards closer cooperation between UNRWA and the major donors on budgetary issues. "UNRWA finances continue to need support. We urge the international community to extend its full assistance and cooperation to UNRWA to assist it in successfully carrying out its mandate," the U.S. statement said. "UNRWA's work is a key element in maintaining an environment conducive to forward movement in the peace process."

Mr. Hansen expressed appreciation on behalf of all UNRWA staff for the "constructive spirit" of the discussion and for the understanding and support shown for the agency.

"With the level of empathy and understanding that I have heard in the course of this debate, I will return to Gaza and prepare to come back to New York for the UNRWA pledging conference on Dec. 5 in a very optimistic mood. I hope that both existing and new contributors to UNRWA will bring us safely not only through 1997, but through every year in the future where UNRWA will have to fulfill its obligations to the Palestine refugees," Mr. Hansen said. — UNRWA press release.

Thousands flee as Taliban tighten grip

KABUL (AFP) — Thousands of Afghan civilians were fleeing villages north of the capital Kabul Wednesday as the Taliban consolidated its grip on newly captured territory.

The militia captured the villages of Kalakan and Istaf Tuesday from opposition coalition forces with minimal fighting. Taliban soldiers and fleeing villagers told AFP close to the frontlines.

"Most of the fighting was concentrated on the main road, as the Taliban were advancing," said Shamsuddin, a resident of Kalakan.

The village of Kalakan is on the so-called Old Road 40 kilometres due north of Kabul, while Istaf is 15 kilometres further northwest, below a range of snowy mountains.

The Old Road is one of two northbound highways exiting Kabul, where most of the fighting between the Taliban and the opposing coalition — made up of ousted government troops loyal to Ahmad Shah Masoud and forces of northern warlord General Abdul Rashid Dostom — has been concentrated.

On this highway a moving stream of well over 2,000 displaced civilians was counted by journalists. They were fleeing the fighting in which many villages were heavily damaged by the intense exchange of rockets and artillery.

These local civilians, some on overcrowded buses but most on foot and carrying whatever belongings they could manage, were heading south to seek sanctuary in the now-peaceful capital Kabul. Frontline Taliban soldiers said they were conducting a mopping-up operation in their captured territory, involving house-to-house searches through farm buildings in the once-thriving agricultural area.

Civilians fleeing the area were subject to close searches at Taliban checkpoints on the main road, where the ultra-strict fundamentalist militia confiscated and smashed "un-Islamic" music cassette-tapes which they hung from their posts.

The frontlines between the opposing forces are now at the Old Road district centre of Qarabagh, with the Taliban militia firmly in positions on the south side of town. Taliban fighters confirmed.

Analysts speculated that should Qarabagh fall to the militia, the anti-Taliban alliance would be forced to withdraw to the provincial centre of Charikar, 65 kilometres north of Kabul, and tighten their defences around the nearby Bagram military airbase.

This Taliban offensive — the first major change in front-line territory in a month — is a serious setback for ex-government commander Masoud, who was pushed out of the capital on Sept. 27.

The Taliban advance could spell the end to his plans to recapture the capital before the winter snows come the below-freezing temperatures make conditions for fighting more difficult.

Iran puts defence budget at $2.7b but actual figure could be much higher

TEHRAN (AFP) — Iran has allocated an average of $2.7 billion a year to the defence budget since the end of the 1980-1988 war against Iraq, a senior official said Wednesday.

Deputy Parliamentary Speaker Hassan Ruhani said during a session of the assembly that the figure was very low for a country as big as Iran and with a population of more than 60 million.

"This is a good indication that we do not pursue an aggressive policy despite the malicious propaganda against the Islamic republic," he said.

Mr. Ruhani, who is also secretary of the National Security Council, the highest political and military decision-making body in Iran, compared his country's defence budget to those of the Gulf Arab neighbours across the Gulf, which he said were "disproportionate".

"Our per capita defence budget is $45, while that of Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates (UAE) and Kuwait is over $1,000," he said.

The official did not specify based on what rate he had calculated the defence budget as there are two different official rates here against foreign currency — 1,750 and 3,000 rials to the dollar. The price on the open market is 4,500 rials to the dollar.

Iranian President Ali

Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, submitting a budget proposal for next year to the parliament, said Sunday that around 8.3 trillion rials had been appropriated for defence.

The figure would amount to $4.7 billion if calculated based on 1,750 rials to the dollar, which is generally the case with defence purchases.

Mr. Ruhani also criticised the presence of American forces in the Gulf, charging that it created "tension" in the region. American warships have been stationed in the region since a U.S.-led military coalition drove Iraqi occupation troops from Kuwait in 1991.

"We hope our Arab brothers in the Gulf will realise the fact that security would only be guaranteed through friendship and good neighbourly ties and not by piling weapons purchased from foreigners," Mr. Ruhani warned.

He nevertheless called for a strong navy to serve as a deterrent against possible foreign attack, saying Iran had common sea borders with 12 countries.

The Iranian navy and the elite Revolutionary Guards are presently engaged in major manoeuvres in the Gulf and Oman Sea.

American and British officials have said the U.S. and allied warships would "closely" monitor the manoeuvres to assess Iran's military capabilities.

Israeli doctors reject British move against circumcision

AMMAN (J.T.) — A Proposal by the British Medical Association (BMA) to declare circumcision "a barbaric act that causes physical and emotional harm" has been shelved by the World Medical Association (WMA) at the initiative of the Israeli Medical Association (IMA), an Israeli newspaper reported yesterday.

At the WMA meeting, attended by physicians from 80 countries and held in South Africa a few weeks ago, the British association called for a declaration stating that male circumcision should not be carried out for medical reasons because of the "harm" it allegedly causes, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Circumcision opponents claimed circumcision can cause the loss of sexual pleasure as well as trauma for the child.

The English language Jerusalem Post quoted IMA chairman Yoram Blachar as saying his organisation feared that a resolution disapproving of circumcision for medical reasons would lead in the future to censure of ritual circumcision as practiced in many countries.

The IMA set up a multidisciplinary medical team that examined circumcision from the medical, psychological and ethical aspects. The conclusions were that surgical removal of the foreskin is not dangerous and even greatly reduces urinary infections and penile cancer.

In addition, cervical cancer among female partners of circumcised men is very low, the Jerusalem Post said.

Lebanon orders ban on guns

BEIRUT (AFP) — The government decided Wednesday to impose a ban on carrying arms on the eve of a nationwide general strike and demonstration in the Lebanese capital in defiance of a ban. Licences for carrying arms have been suspended, the Defence Ministry said. Only official bodyguards are exempted.

The same measure was adopted for a general strike on Feb. 29. The army was put in charge of internal security for a three-month period and imposed a curfew on the day itself.

Lebanon's main trade union body has called another strike and a demonstration for Thursday to protest against the social policies of Prime Minister Rafik Hariri's government and its "repression of public freedom."

Queen gives keynote address at Cambridge Union Society

AMMAN (J.T.) — The search for peace in the Middle East is still "beset by increasingly explosive issues of human rights abuses, collective punishments and violence," as well as a "growing inflexibility on crucial issues like water rights, frontiers and the continued expansion of illegal settlements," Her Majesty Queen Noor Tuesday said during her keynote address at the Cambridge Union Society in England.

According to a Royal Court statement, the Queen noted that a study by the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCA) demonstrated that since 1967, "Israeli authorities and settlers have confiscated over two-thirds of the West Bank and over 40 per cent of the Gaza Strip, for whom, being a rural community reliant on agricultural production, the loss is doubly devastating."

She added that the "much delayed Israeli redeployment from Hebron where 400 settlers are located among 120,000 Palestinians and the maximalist Israeli position on the status of Jerusalem" is causing people throughout the Middle East "to question whether those strides that have been made towards peace will in fact ever live up to their heightened expectations."

While Jordan, the Queen said, has been "firmly convinced that the peace process in the Middle East was irreversible, the lack of implementation of accords reached on the Palestinian-Israeli track and, to some extent, of some of the bilateral agreements between Jordan and Israel have demonstrated the fragility of the progress," the statement said.

The Queen cited five major challenges which, she stated, must be met to build a comprehensive and enduring peace, foremost among which is "to complete the Arab-Israeli peace process without delay and within a well defined time frame."

She affirmed that the quality of peace and the attainment of its full promise depend entirely on the resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict in all its dimensions and among all concerned parties, the statement said.

Fostering regional economic cooperation, according to the Queen, is also vital since "only seven per cent of trade in the Middle East is internal." Integrating the Middle East in the global system of liberalised trade and capital markets, through reform policies and investment-friendly environments, will "promote joint ventures, higher productivity and increased job opportunities," the Queen stated.

This is of critical importance for the region, which has "one of the highest unemployment rates in the world" and where nearly "three-fourths of the population have a per capita income of only about $1,000 per year."

Such economic restructuring, noted the Queen, must be accompanied by the reduction of social and economic disparities within our societies as well as domestic political reform, the statement said.

She described participatory decision-making as an essential guarantor of peace and emphasised the importance of integrating culturally appropriate democratic values in national political structures that draw upon "the rich variety of participatory decision-making traditions in Arab Islamic cultures."

Such challenges can and should be addressed internationally with the help of Europe and the international community as well as on a domestic level, the Queen said.

She added that "the forces for peace in the Arab World and Israel alike should be mobilised to exert a more powerful influence and face these challenges."

Jordan, according to the Queen, has embarked on fundamental reforms in two spheres, namely democratisation and economic structural reform; it has "liberalised its trade system, reduced tariffs, simplified trade laws and enacted new laws that are transparent and investor friendly."

She added that "a major feature of our economy in the coming years will be the expansion of the private sector's role in initiating infrastructure projects, particularly in the fields of communications, energy, transport, water and tourism."

The Queen noted that Jordan's legal, administrative and fiscal measures have earned it "the recognition of the European Union as the most advanced country in the region in implementing market reforms," the statement said.

Such economic liberalisation has had a "tremendously positive impact on our macro-economic indicators," where the country has maintained a 6 per cent annual growth rate since 1992, unemployment dropped from 25 per cent to 15 per cent, inflation has been contained at 4 per cent and exports increased by 25 per cent last year with a projected 9 per cent increase by the end of 1996.

She added that while political and economic reforms are crucial, their integration with participatory decision-making, gender equity and comprehensive development will help create an environment that will foster peace and accelerate the transition from wasteful militarism to productive economic cooperation.

The Queen concluded by saying that the "quality of peace, combined with prospects for progress, regionalisation and globalisation in the Middle East, will determine if all in our region will advance or retreat, prosper or flounder."

A just and comprehensive peace which is accepted by all Middle Eastern peoples will enable us to "build upon our progress and promote cooperation with the rest of the world that fuels economic development, cultural exchange and mutual respect," she said.

After the speech, the Queen answered questions about the impact of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's election on the peace process, Jordan's economy, the status of Jerusalem, internal division within Israel as well as Jordan's bilateral trade agreements with the Palestinian National Authority.

Since its foundation in 1815, the Cambridge Union Society has occupied a central position in Cambridge University's undergraduate life.

The union has recently hosted lectures by international figures such as the Prince of Wales, Chancellor Kohl, the Dalai Lama, George Shultz, Casper Weinberger and Professor Stephen Hawking.

Sensor Leila Sharaf and Advisor to the Queen Lina Toukan attended the lecture.

Ministry to inspect flood damage, condoles relatives of deceased

AMMAN (J.T.) — The Ministry of Tourism and Antiquities was Wednesday making arrangements to transport the body of Tom Van Doep, the 62 year old Dutch tourist killed in flash floods, to the Netherlands.

Mr. Van Doep and Fayez Aqrabawi, his tourist guide, were killed Monday in flash floods hitting the southern regions of Jordan.

The body of Mr. Aqrabawi was also delivered to his family in Aqaba, according to Minister of Tourism and Antiquities Saleh Irshaidat.

Dr. Irshaidat visited the widow of Mr. Van Doep Wednesday at the Amra hotel to convey the Kingdom's condolences and inspected measures and services being accorded to her as well as arrangements for transportation of the body.

Hassan Hilalat, 17, also drowned and his body was found Tuesday morning in the city of Petra.

The floods resulted from torrential rains which hit Petra, Wadi Mousa and Ma'an, causing extensive damage to roads and other property as well as washing away seven vehicles and various construction materials.

The floods carried earth and rocks which had partially blocked roads in the Ma'an, Petra and Eel areas and disrupted

Teams from the Ministry of Public Works and the district electricity department were Wednesday reported as continuing repairs and reopening roads.

Minister of Public Works and Housing Abdul Hadi Majali affirmed that his ministry will dispatch a team of engineers and other officials to study the situation and duly submit a detailed report.

This projected report will be presented to the Council of Ministers who will deem which measures would be appropriate to alleviate the situation.

Also Wednesday, Ma'an Governor Abdul Ghani Abdullah inspected the district of Al Jafer where floods caused some damage to public and private property.

The Jordanian Armed Forces has been providing equipment to help local repair teams carry out this task.

In the meantime, the Department of Meteorology forecast further scattered showers in the northern and southern areas as a result of unstable weather conditions.

The department also warned of poor visibility in the early morning hours.

Peace process scenarios to be debated in seminar

By Francesca Ciriaci
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — "And what if the peace process fails...?" is the enigmatic theme of a three-day conference to convene here next month and slated to be attended by more than 70 prominent scholars and experts worldwide.

The conference, hosted by the Royal Academy for Islamic Civilisation Research AL al Bait Foundation, and to be held at the InterContinental hotel, has been organised by the Academy of the Kingdom of Morocco.

Established by King Hassan of Morocco, the Academy counts among its members scholars from diverse Islamic countries and is holding its autumn session in Amman upon the invitation of HRH Crown Prince Hassan, the Regent, himself a member of the Academy.

Assistant to the president as well as dialogue coordinator at AL al Bait Foundation, Farouq Jarrar, confirmed that three Jordanian speakers will contribute to the debate.

Sensor and former Prime Minister Zeid Rifai, Senator and former Foreign Minister Kamel Abu Jaber and Senator and former Minister of Information Jawad Anani will state their views before the international audience over the future of the peace process and possible scenarios in case peace negotiations fail.

The conference will be held under the patronage of HRH Crown Prince Hassan, the Regent, who is also the patron of AL al Bait Foundation.

Dr. Jarrar explained that the foundation, established in 1980 and containing more than 100 members from 38 countries, is an international independent Islamic body aimed at promoting and implementing research on all aspects of Islamic civilisation, "intended in the broadest sense."

Inter-faith dialogue is of paramount importance among the foundation's objectives.

"Not only does AL al Bait Foundation focus on Muslim-Christian dialogue, but it also promotes inter-dialogue among different schools of thought in Islam, (i.e. Sunni-Shiite dialogue)," Dr. Jarrar said, adding that the foundation has previously organised four inter-Muslim conferences and 16 Muslim-Christian meetings in Amman and Europe.

AL al Bait Foundation also heads the Higher Committee for the History of Jordan, "an independent committee of scholars which has already published 52 books, mostly in Arabic, on the history of Jordan," Dr. Jarrar said.

Workshop covers role of political parties

By Christina Schlegel
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — A two-day workshop regarding the role of political parties in Jordan will be held on Dec. 1st and 2nd at the Royal Cultural Centre and organised by the German-based Konrad Adenauer Foundation in cooperation with the New Jordan Research Centre (NJRC).

The workshop, which was originally to be held in September, will look into the reasons for what the NJRC described as the "low profile" of Jordanian political parties and will also discuss ways of strengthening this role for the upcoming 1997 elections.

A statement released by the Konrad Adenauer Foundation said that since the reintroduction of political parties, as of Sep. 1, 1992, some 23 parties registered, but failed to play a major role in the 1993 elections.

The workshop's programme is divided into six panels and includes lectures by local experts as well as participants from German political parties (the Christian Democratic Party (CDP)) as well as the Lebanese University in Beirut.

The first day's session will cover topics such as "Realities of party work in Jordan," "Experience of political parties — a comparative approach" and "The political programme and participatory party work."

The second day will focus on

"Political parties and elections," "Improving political parties' work in society" and "The future of political party work in Jordan," all of which will subsequently be analysed in a round table discussion.

"The workshop," researcher Hamed Dabbas from the NJRC Wednesday told the Jordan Times, "is aimed to give Jordanian political parties the chance to overcome obstacles — both internal and external — to party work and to demonstrate possible methods of effective party building."

Another major topic will be the encouragement of women in political participation.

"Up until the present time," Mr. Dabbas said, "women's interest in political party participation has been very low and we hope to improve the situation with this seminar."

The conference organisers also hope to increase awareness of the Jordanian democratic process, stimulate interest in working within political parties and encourage a more active role within the framework of political life, he stated.

According to the NJRC, 16 of Jordan's political parties will participate in the workshop.

Comoran police are still holding 2 hijack suspects

MORONI, Comoro Islands (R) — Police were Wednesday still holding two men suspected of being involved in the hijacking of an Ethiopian Airlines plane even though the airline has absolved the two of responsibility.

The commander of the Comoro Islands gendarmerie, Ismael Mognidaho, who is leading the investigation, said he would not bow to pressure to release the two, a Kenyan and a Djibouti national.

"We arrested these two people after having cross-checked the accounts of a number of survivors," he told Reuters.

The Ethiopian Airlines Boeing 767 was hijacked Saturday as it flew from Addis Ababa to Nairobi. The plane ran out of fuel and crashed into the sea off the Comoros, an archipelago 300 kilometres east of the African mainland.

Fifty of the 175 passengers and crew survived. The other 125 are dead or presumed dead. By Tuesday evening 121 bodies had been recovered.

The two men detained by police were identified by some of the survivors as being two of the three hijackers.

However, the co-pilot, Yonas Mekuria, who was beaten up by the hijackers, said they were not the culprits.

In the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian police issued a statement declaring their innocence.

"The Kenyan and the Djibouti nationals who are in custody in Comoro Islands were not involved in the hijacking and the accident of the Boeing 767 Ethiopian Airlines plane Saturday," it said. "They are innocent passengers."

Mr. Mekuria and another surviving crew member have been ordered to remain in the Comoros to help with the investigation.

Kenya's Daily Nation newspaper Wednesday named the Kenyan as businessman Michael Odenyo, who had initially been listed as one of the people who died in the crash.

The newspaper said his family only found out he was alive and being held at a police station by a circuitous route.

A Kenyan trying to telephone the Comoros on an unrelated business got through to the police station. Mr. Odenyo heard a police officer mention Kenya and asked to speak to the caller.

The caller then rang the Central Bank of Kenya, where Odenyo's wife works, and the good news was finally relayed to her by a colleague.

"The past three days have been traumatic and a nightmare has happened for which I thank God," Mr. Odenyo's mother told the newspaper. His father has now gone to Moroni, the Comoran capital, and the family believes Mr. Odenyo will be released as soon as the father confirms his son's identity.

Only two of the bodies recovered from the wreckage had left the island by Tuesday evening. The rest remain in a makeshift morgue that used to be a meat importer's cold storage room.

The small country of about half a million people was struggling to cope with the aftermath of the tragedy.

"These people, who had been unexpectedly highly efficient in carrying out the rescue operation within a short space of time, are not actually up to the job of coordination of the whole process," said a local official.

Investigation and evacuation, "one foreign diplomat here," to evacuate a body, told Reuters.

Breakaway Khmer Rouge military commanders resign

PHNOM PENH (R) — The top two commanders of breakaway Khmer Rouge divisions in Cambodia's northwest have resigned to devote their attention to politics, officials said Wednesday.

Ei Chien, commander of Division 415 in Pailin, and Sok Pheap, Division 450 commander in Phnom Malai, would now devote their time to the Democratic National United Movement (DNUM), an organisation started by breakaway leader Ieng Sary, an aide to Sok Pheap told Reuters.

"My commander Sok Pheap is not the divisional commander of 450 any more, as he has joined with DNUM, led by Ieng Sary," the aide to Sok Pheap said from Phnom Malai. He said Sok Pheap's deputy, Him Phon, would replace him as commander.

Em Mara, an official at the defence ministry, confirmed that Ei Chien had stepped down. He said Ei Chien, who has identified himself in the past as vice chairman of DNUM, would be replaced by his deputy commander, Chhun Nhep. The officials were vague about the date of the resignations, but said they believed they took place around Nov. 6, the day the commanders merged their troops with government forces.

Long Norin, an advisor to Ieng Sary, told Reuters he believed the resignations happened on Nov. 6.

Political analysts said the resignations came as a surprise, and that it was not clear if it signalled greater political involvement for the former commanders or whether it meant they would be taking on posts in the government army.

General elections in Cambodia are set for 1998.

"This could allow them to maintain the military wing of their movement through loyal deputies while strengthening the political wing of their movement," said one analyst.

Long Norin denied any political ambitions for the movement, insisting it was not a political party and only existed to "educate our members and our nation about reconciliation."

Ieng Sary, foreign minister during the Khmer Rouge's 1975-1979 reign of terror, broke with hardliners of the Maoist guerrilla movement in August and founded DNUM.

Ieng Sary, who was pardoned in September for his role in the genocidal regime and whose troops believed to number up to 4,000, joined the government earlier this month, has described DNUM as a neutral movement that seeks peace with the government.

Government officials said they did not know what the roles of Sok Pheap and Ei Chien would be in DNUM.

Co-premiers Prince Norodom Ranariddh and Hun Sen have tried to recruit Khmer Rouge defectors to their own parties during a period of increasing tension between the coalition leaders as they begin to position themselves ahead of the 1998 elections.

The Khmer Rouge, whose regime left more than one million Cambodians dead, have been crippled by mass defections in recent months. The guerrilla group reneged on a U.N.-sponsored peace pact in 1991 and have been fighting the coalition government.

Sri Lanka heads for polls in war zone

COLOMBO (AFP) — Sri Lanka Wednesday announced local elections in the island's battle-scarred northern regions for the first time in 13 years in a bid to revive civil administration in the area, officials here said.

Elections commissioner Dayananda Dissanayake said nominations will open on Dec. 11 to elect members to 27 municipal, urban and village councils in four districts.

The separatist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) were dominating large parts of the northern province, but the area under their control was reduced considerably following military operations launched last year.

Elections Chief Dissanayake said the main council up for grabs will be Jaffna municipality, the main local authority in the north of the country. Tamil Tiger guerrillas were driven out of the area last year.

"These will be the first local elections in the areas since 1983," Chief Dissanayake said. He said balloting that was to be held in 1987 had been postponed since then because of security considerations.

Under election laws, the latest vote must be conducted between the end of January and early February and the exact date is expected to be announced on Dec. 17.

The government has said that it wants a local Tamil leadership to emerge in Jaffna to take over the rehabilitation of the embattled region where most civilian duties are now supervised by the military.

Although the government made the surprise announcement of the vote in the north, local council elections in the rest of the country have been postponed three times till April next year.

The government of President Chandrika Kumaratunga last year postponed the local bodies' election by one year with the agreement of the main opposition and later twice by using tough emergency regulations.

Khan sees bright future in Pakistan politics

ISLAMABAD (AFP) — Former Pakistani cricket hero Imran Khan vowed a spirited solo battle by his nascent political party in the next national election, in an interview published here Wednesday.

"We will make no alliance with others, ours will be a solo flight," Mr. Khan said of the Tehreek-e-Insaf (Movement for Justice) he launched about nine months ago at the start of his political career.

The next polls, due on Feb. 3, will be the "most stormy" in Pakistan's history, Mr. Khan told domestic news agency NNI.

The manifesto of his party focuses on social justice, good governance and elimination of political and administrative corruption.

Mr. Khan predicted electoral failure for the mainstream parties, the Pakistan People's Party (PPP) of ousted Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto and Pakistan Muslim League of her archrival Nawaz Sharif, also a former premier.

"Both have already been tested by the nation," he said.

Singling out PPP, he forecast that Ms. Bhutto's party would be "wiped out" in the elections.

Mr. Khan enjoys personal popularity due to his cricket exploits and his humanitarian work in raising a modern cancer hospital with the help of public donations, but his fledgling party is still in an organisational phase.

In a country where politicians are a suspect lot widely accused of corruption, Mr. Khan has a moral advantage with his name untainted by any corruption scandal.

Lukashenko's power grab sets off alarm bells abroad

MINSK (Agencies) — Belarus President Alexander Lukashenko's power grab has outmanoeuvred the opposition and raised concern about how he plans to use his virtually unassailable authority in the ex-Soviet republic.

Some western diplomats are now asking how much further Mr. Lukashenko will go, after he bypassed opposition from parliament, the constitutional court and the central electoral commission to boost his already considerable powers.

"Just three months ago I did not believe he was dangerous, but now I've changed my mind," one diplomat admitted, asking not to be named.

Political opponents and human rights activists have accused the 42-year-old president of creating a dictatorship on the back of a landslide victory in a controversial referendum Sunday which boosted his powers.

About 100 pro-Lukashenko deputies broke away from the Belarus parliament, still called the supreme Soviet, and set up a new assembly Tuesday, declaring the old parliament defunct.

Mr. Lukashenko's strong-arm tactics have raised fears in Europe that a new dictatorship may have emerged in this republic of 10 million inhabitants, sandwiched between Russia and Poland.

"A black mountain has risen up in the centre of Europe," said deputy Viktor Gonchar, a former ally of Mr. Lukashenko, but now one of his most outspoken opponents.

The United States "is not going to be able to have a normal, positive relationship with a government that is fundamentally anti-democratic," state department spokesman Nicholas Burns said, commenting on Mr. Lukashenko's power grab.

The new constitution, endorsed by a landslide majority in Mr. Lukashenko's referendum, does not provide any real counterweight to the Belarus president, a former Communist apparatchik collective farm boss who came to power in July 1994.

Mr. Lukashenko can now have the final say in the

A deputy in the alternative Belarusian Parliament raises his arm to speak while President Alexander Lukashenko looks on during a session of the Parliament in Minsk. composition of a new two-chamber parliament, the constitutional court and electoral commission.

"He is on the verge of gaining what he wanted — total power," said one diplomat.

Mr. Lukashenko has repeatedly insisted that there are no grounds to talk of a dictatorship in Belarus.

But he said his referendum, denounced as illegal by the opposition, was aimed at ensuring "order and discipline."

Belarus does not have prisoners of conscience, and trade unions, political parties and demonstrations are tolerated.

However, the authorities have intimidated the opposition, muzzling the press, and some newspapers have appeared with blank spaces where the censors have excised politically incorrect opinions.

Several Belarusian newspapers are now printed in neighbouring Lithuania.

According to Sergei Kol'yakin, leader of the Communist parliamentary group, Mr. Lukashenko's "main enemy is the economy," and he predicts that a return to a command economy will bring ruin and chaos.

Mr. Lukashenko's Soviet-style interference in market processes has already led to food stocks running lower and lower in Belarusian shops and a much slower pace of reform than in neighbouring Poland or Russia.

The risk is that Mr. Lukashenko, a populist who uses stridently pro-Moscow and anti-NATO rhetoric, will use the West as a scapegoat for the country's economic ills, one diplomat said.

The European Union has adopted a softer public stance toward Mr. Lukashenko than that of the United States, perhaps aware that nothing would be gained by isolating Belarus.

Another question mark hangs over Mr. Lukashenko's project to reintegrate his country with Russia, the Slav big brother which dominated Belarus from the end of the 18th century to the collapse of the Soviet Union in December 1991.

Some opposition critics have even suggested that Mr. Lukashenko harbours long-term plans to enter the Kremlin in the event of reunification with Russia.

In April the two countries signed a far-reaching union treaty envisaging the creation of supra-national bodies and a host of other areas of cooperation, setting a precedent in Moscow's relations with other former Soviet republics.

The Belarus constitutional court insisted Wednesday that Mr. Lukashenko's referendum was only consultative, rejecting his claim that it was legally binding.

The constitutional court chairman sent a letter to Mr. Lukashenko reiterating its ruling last week that the referendum was only consultative, court spokesman Oleg Maskhalov said.

Meanwhile, the new assembly of pro-Lukashenko deputies adopted a law Wednesday to make the referendum result legally binding — a move denounced by the old parliament as unconstitutional.

Meanwhile, a council of Europe delegation officially pronounced illegitimate Wednesday the results of a referendum in Belarus which gave President Alexander Lukashenko sweeping powers.

A committee from the Pan-European body, set up after World War II to promote human rights and democracy, said in a statement released at a news conference that it was impossible "to reach a positive conclusion as to the democratic legitimacy of the referendum and its results."

Appealing to Mr. Lukashenko to respect parliamentary democracy and the rule of law, the statement expressed concern that the way a new legislature was being formed "might deprive the Belarusian parliament of its legitimacy."

Russia to pull out last Chechenya troops by Jan. 25

MOSCOW (R) — Russia's defence ministry will start pulling out its last troops from breakaway Chechenya on Dec. 1 and the withdrawal will end by Jan. 25, the eve of planned elections there, Interfax news agency said Wednesday.

The decision follows a pledge made by President Boris Yeltsin last weekend to withdraw Russia's two remaining units from the region, where Moscow failed to defeat separatists in a 21-month-long bloody war.

Interfax, quoting an unnamed source in the army's general staff, said the remaining troops numbered about 6,000. The ministry will also remove 2,000 armoured vehicles, four tonnes of supplies and 400 tonnes of military equipment, it added.

Russia has already withdrawn the bulk of its troops from Chechenya following an Aug. 31 peace treaty that deferred a decision on the region's final political status for five years.

But Moscow had wanted to leave two units permanently in Chechenya — one from the defence ministry and another from the interior ministry.

Mr. Yeltsin's surprise announcement that they would also be withdrawn sparked anger among his Communist and nationalist opponents in the State Duma lower house of parliament.

They plan to hold an extraordinary parliamentary session Friday to discuss the issue, arguing that by withdrawing the troops Mr. Yeltsin is sanctioning Chechen independence.

They have threatened to try to impeach Mr. Yeltsin — a long drawn-out procedure which has little chance of success — or to call for a no-confidence vote in the government.

The brigade being withdrawn will be stationed in the southern Russian city of Budennovsk, where scores of people were killed in June last year when Chechen rebels took hostages at a local hospital.

The incident forced Moscow to negotiate a ceasefire with the rebels in Chechenya, where tens of thousands of people, mostly civilians, had been killed since Russian troops were sent into the region in December 1994.

Elections to set up a post-war administration in Chechenya are scheduled for Jan. 27.

Chechen separatist leader Zelimkhan Yandarbiyev has already said he plans to run for the presidency and other candidates are likely to surface after the official launch of the election campaign Wednesday.

Patten defends Hong Kong subversion bill move

TOKYO (R) — Hong Kong Governor Chris Patten Wednesday defended his government's move to introduce a new anti-subversion bill before the colony's return to China and lashed out at Beijing for refusing dialogue on the issue.

"Very reluctantly, we decided that we would need to go ahead to honour our commitment to Hong Kong," Gov. Patten, who is in Tokyo on a six-day visit, told a news conference.

He is in Japan to attend a business seminar and to discuss with Japanese political and business leaders the colony's future before and after its handover to China next year.

Britain took steps Tuesday to bring in a pre-emptive new law on subversion ahead of Hong Kong's 1997 return, laying down legal markers defining the concepts of treason, sedition, subversion and secession in a bid to head off jarrings of dissidents after Beijing takes over the colony.

Chinese officials in Hong Kong immediately attacked the move and pro-China politicians said the law would probably be erased and replaced after China resumes sovereignty at midnight next June 30.

"We've been discussing for 17 months — 17 months — with Chinese officials on this issue and frankly, by and large, Chinese officials have refused to enter into a dialogue," Gov. Patten said.

He said nothing in the joint declaration between Britain and China prohibited translating what is common law in Britain into the language of international law. He said the breach of the agreement came from China, which recently announced it was setting up a provisional legislature.

"People living in glass houses should be careful of lobbying bricks around," Gov. Patten said.

A spokesman for China's de-facto embassy in Hong Kong said that Britain would have to take responsibility for all the consequences of amending the law.

Commenting on Beijing's reaction, Gov. Patten said: "There were no questions whatsoever (from China) about the details of what we were proposing."

"It's curious that rather than say what is wrong, we continue to get propaganda," he said.

"The challenge is for China that Hong Kong can, under Chinese sovereignty, do as well as it did (before the reversion) or better," Gov. Patten said.

He told Japanese business leaders during a meeting earlier Wednesday that Hong Kong's success was due to its deregulation policies and free market.

"I hope you (Japan) will stay interested and diplomatically supportive of the maintenance of Hong Kong and the rest of the world, as a free society under the rule of law," Gov. Patten said.

Gov. Patten said he was "cautiously optimistic" about Hong Kong after the 1997 revision, and expressed confidence in the people of Hong Kong and its civic institutions to maintain the freedom and economic prosperity of the territory.

Gov. Patten also pressed Tokyo to afford Hong Kong's post-1997 passports preferential treatment over mainland Chinese passports.

U.N. awaits answer, still

THE U.S. has so far managed to block the election of U.N. Secretary General Boutros Ghali to a second term in office. It did so by vetoing his reelection bid though all the other 14 member states of the Security Council supported him.

The overwhelming support that the incumbent secretary general enjoys in the General Assembly attests to the fact that Dr. Ghali is the choice of almost all the U.N. member states with the sole exception of Washington. Why then does not the U.S. want him there, risking in the process being isolated even by its most trusted allies and friends?

President Bill Clinton's National Security Adviser Anthony Lake reaffirmed Sunday that his government needed Dr. Ghali replaced in order to convince Congress to pay its more than $1 billion in arrears to the U.N. Admitting that the secretary general "has done many good things" and that President Clinton personally likes him, Mr. Lake went on to say that "the problem is that the U.N. is in desperate need for reform and we (the U.S.) need a secretary general who can carry out those reforms in a way that Boutros Ghali has not." Another problem, in the estimation of Mr. Lake, "was the U.N. debacle in Somalia where 18 U.S. soldiers died." Perhaps the National Security Adviser would have liked to add to the U.S. list of grievances against Dr. Ghali the Bosnian conflict as well. The Americans could, for instance, choose to place the blame for inaction against the Serbs on the secretary general, especially with regard to Srebrenica, which was declared a safe haven by the U.N. but was never defended when the Serbs attacked it and massacred thousands of fleeing Bosnian Muslims.

No one is suggesting that the U.N. under Dr. Ghali has been perfect. But the fact remains that the international organisation has never been perfect either. The function of the secretary general, whoever he may be, has been and remains the execution of the decisions of the member states especially the permanent members of the Security Council. Dr. Ghali, like all his predecessors, has essentially been the head of the U.N. bureaucracy, nothing more and nothing less. If there have been shortcomings in the management of the U.N. Secretariat, it is the fault of the member states which make administrative and financial decisions that the secretary general has no alternative but to implement.

The U.S. is certainly right in wanting to reform the U.N. Where Washington is wrong, however, is in believing that reforming the organisation can be accomplished without correcting the performance of the member states and their resolutions. No matter who heads the U.N., the problems facing it would continue until and unless member states face up to these problems in a serious manner. That is why we think that the continued obstruction of Dr. Ghali's reelection is not the answer to the woes of the international organisation.

ARABIC PRESS COMMENTARIES

NOW THAT Iraq and the United Nations have reached full understanding on a mechanism for the implementation of an agreement on oil for food, hopes have risen that Iraqi oil will be flowing again and the Iraqis will see the beginning of the end of their long sufferings caused by the U.N. embargo, said Mahmoud Rimawi, a writer for Al Ra'i. For six long years Iraq has been deprived of revenues, its people have been suffering due to food and medicines shortages and its children have been dying at the rate of 5,000 a month, according to U.N. agencies, said the writer. The stumbling block before Iraq's exporting its oil was the United States and it is hoped that the Americans will not find further excuses to justify the non-implementation of the Iraqi-U.N. agreement, said the writer. Should a problem of American creation crop up now, it would bring with it a real disaster to Iraq which has complied with all the U.N. resolutions and has done all that has been required from it in order to see the end of the ordeal, added the writer. The writer said the Arabs hope that the partial exportation of oil for food and medicine would pave the way for the gradual lifting of the embargo.

COMMENTING ON Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's threats that Israeli forces might resort to reoccupying the West Bank towns and the Gaza Strip in order to subdue the will of the Palestinian people, a writer for Al Dostour said that this time the Israeli forces will not find this task a bed of roses, but rather would face fierce resistance that could trigger hostilities in the whole region. Saleh Qallab said that Mr. Netanyahu, in a bid to intimidate the Palestinians into refraining from declaring an independent Palestinian state, has massed his troops and tanks around the West Bank towns and Gaza and is beefing up the Israeli settlements. The reoccupation of these towns would mean total abrogation of the Oslo accords and a return to the intifada with a greater force, said the writer. The Palestinians are determined to declare their independent state in two years' time because by then the time limit given to the Oslo deal to be implemented would have expired, but their move is bound to draw further Israeli acts of repression and aggression against the Palestinian people, according to the writer. In the light of such developments, he said, the whole Palestinian nation would be up in arms resisting the Israeli occupation forces.

Bikes, spikes, parks and the need to do things right

By Dr. Ahmad Y. Majdoubeh

THE LETTER to the editor written by nine-year old Daniel Robert Linfield entitled "Spikes in parks" (Jordan Times, Nov. 9, 1996), evokes in my mind a few thoughts about consciousness of public matters, individual responsibility, public awareness of danger and institutional vision.

Daniel starts his short but sensitive, informing and informed letter by expressing his appreciation for "all the parks that have been built around Amman," thus recognising the commendable efforts which the Greater Amman Municipality has, for years, been exerting to make the capital greener and cleaner. This is not only a smart rhetorical move on the part of young Daniel (before one criticises, one needs to praise the criticism with a complement) but a wise, mature thing to do (one has to take note of the positive as well as the negative). Many adult, experienced men of words and letters in our part of the world who indulge, relish, revel and thrive on negative criticism alone can perhaps learn from young Daniel's tone and strategy.

In the main body of the letter, however, Daniel raises two issues of serious concern to him, and (indeed) to all of us. The first is that since children need space (ample, safe space) to play in (instead of playing in the streets and exposing themselves and others to danger), they assume that the parks which the municipality has been building so diligently cater, in part at least, to the needs of these children. But this is not the case with respect to the specific park Daniel is talking about (and many others in the capital) for, the letter tells us, "there is no play area" in it. One understands, of course, the fact that gardens and parks may be planned and executed with the people's aesthetic needs in mind. But would it not be also nice if they took the more practical (and perhaps even more pressing) needs into account. Many children choke to death in apartment buildings (which themselves have no space for children to play in) and many die while playing in the streets as a result of run-over accidents committed by both careless and careful motorists. Those who survive are a nuisance to the neighbours and a bother to the environment.

The second point Daniel raises is equally serious. He tells us he does "not like" the park "at all" because there is "a very dangerous fence around it." What does that mean? Daniel explains: "The fence is dangerous because it is made out of sharp metal spikes and they are right at the level where a child might fall on them. Every day I see children riding their bikes near these spikes. Soon someone will have a very bad accident that might kill them."

It is this part of the letter that I wish to reflect upon. First of all, one cannot but admire Daniel for raising a matter of public interest. It is explicitly clear in his letter that the main cause of concern for him is not his personal safety only, but that of others: "Every day I see children riding their bikes..." Since Daniel is aware of the danger the fence poses, the fence may not pose any serious threat to him; the threat is to those children who ride the bikes and are not aware of the danger. For Daniel, a nine-year old boy, to care about the safety of other children is noble. More important than the nobleness, however, is the altruistic implication of his concern and the meaning of such altruism within our overall social context.

There is no doubt that our citizens are altruistic and supportive in many ways. When your car stalls in winter time, many people volunteer to push (though perhaps not as many today as fifteen years ago, even before you ask. If people see you carrying something heavy, they volunteer to assist. If a blind person is attempting to cross the street, many rush to help. Many students at our universities spend much of their time reading for a blind fellow classmate, filling out forms for them in registration time, writing down answers for them in exams, socialising with them, etc.

Though altruistic and supportive, people in our part of the world are in many ways (especially at a personal level) often selfish, indifferent and careless with respect to matters of public interest. How many people pass daily by the park which Daniel is talking about? I happen to be familiar with the neighbourhood Daniel is describing; it is not one of the heavily-populated areas in Amman; but it is a sizeable neighbourhood nonetheless. How many of those passing by reflect on what may happen to kids who ride their bicycles by the infamous fence? Very few, if any. Being aware of matters of public interest is not particularly visible in our part of the world. Daniel most probably owes such consciousness to his parents, for public-conscious people are made, not born.

"Though altruistic and supportive, people in our part of the world are in many ways (especially at a personal level) often selfish, indifferent and careless with respect to matters of public interest."

But perhaps more important than consciousness of a matter harmful to the public is the willingness, the guts to do something about it. Daniel has not only taken notice of the problem and has been bothered by it, he has also decided to do something about it, to write about it publicly. Daniel and those who are like him, however, are the exception, not the rule, in our culture. Some of us (many of us) may be conscious of a matter annoying the public; a few may be bothered by it. How many, however, care to do something about it? Much less than a few. People in our society, as I argued last week, lack faith in their ability as individuals to effect change, and they therefore fail to take the initiative. What is my responsibility as an individual to my society and to the world at large? Daniel's last words in the said letter are revealing: "Whoever is in charge of park fences should ban this kind from Jordan and the world." Not only "from Jordan" but also "from the world." This is the right spirit.

I still cannot get over the old lady who stood in front of a high-rise building in Chicago in the summer heat of 1988 smiling politely at passers-by gathering signatures in an attempt to prevent the cutting down of a tree in the sidewalk. More than words, we want deeds, small though they may be; more than lamentation, we need action.

The most important point to stress here, and the most important lesson to be learned from Daniel's letter, is perhaps the question of awareness of danger. I have just asked above: How many people who pass the fence which Daniel passes care about the danger it poses or care about doing something about it? But perhaps I should ask instead: How many of those passing the fence actually realise that there is potential danger involved? We live in a culture which greatly underestimates danger. And this is no joke. The person who fixed my car exhaust last week spent half an hour under the car welding without using any form of protection for his eyes. A person who came to help him half-way through worked with a chemical material without wearing his gloves. I have seen farmers and gardeners spray insecticides against a strong breeze with their mouths wide open. (A gardener died as a result of this at one of Amman's hotels last year). I see construction workers hanging 10, 15, 20 metres above ground with no safety measures whatsoever. How many of our children have drowned in reservoirs? How many street-soccer players have been killed?

One of the tragicomic stories I have heard from a friend is about a gardener who comes annually to cut the odd branches in his farm; he would sit (3-4 metres above ground) on the branch he plans to cut and actually starts cutting.

How many of our sidewalks are fit to walk on? How many of our streets are fit to drive in? A few winters ago, I was driving on a major highway — one of the best in Eastern Amman: I was in the middle of the street when my left wheel plunged in a hole filled with water and the tyre exploded. When I got out of the car and looked, the hole was more than half a metre deep.

But if one faults individuals in our society for failing to be aware of danger, one faults the officials in charge of things even more for failing to anticipate danger, failing to address dangerous situations or respond to complaints about it. We may be able to live with the fact that few in Daniel's neighbourhood realise the potential threat the spiky fence poses, but what about those people who built the fence. I know that the municipality has some of the best engineers and some of the best planners and strategists. How come they have not thought about the danger such spikes would pose? Have such engineers succumbed, like everybody else in this culture, to a carefree attitude and a danger-free vision of the world? Have they stopped to care? Or is it that the spikes have been ingeniously thought of by the head of a department whom no engineer dares to contradict? Or has the fence been designed and built by a non-specialist, say a janitor or a manual labourer? One fails to understand. Is it not somewhat shameful that a nine-year-old notices and cares about what our adult planners, administrators and engineers either do not notice or do not care about?

Something is seriously wrong with the way many of us (private individuals as well as officials) see, perceive, express and stand with respect to matters pertaining to public safety. There is a great deal to learn from Daniel's letter, regarding correct perception and correct action.

What kind of future do divided Israelis want?

By Flora Lewis

M. KAHIL

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM

The conversation hovers around catastrophe. It is not only among Arabs. In Europe and among some in the United States, that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's conduct of Israeli policy is causing distress and deep concern about Middle East peace. Many Israelis voice their fears in even stronger terms. There has never been such an open, harsh, angry split in Israeli opinion.

The most vivid critics are people who did not vote for Mr. Netanyahu, and they detest him personally as well as politically. But even his supporters are saying ugly things. His aides are aware that they face a severe loss of confidence with which they must deal.

The big question everybody asks is what his real intentions are in continuing negotiations, and nobody presumes to know for sure.

The official American position is to await concrete "tests," specific points in carrying out the Oslo agreements.

For the moment, terms for the promised withdrawal of Israeli troops from 80 per cent of Hebron are the focal issue, and it is getting more, not less, emotionally explosive as people on both sides denounce concessions already made. Hebron is the last major Palestinian city under occupation.

The argument is over how to guarantee the security of some 450 ultra-orthodox Jewish settlers (300 of them children) determined to stay in the heart of the city. Secular Israelis resent the need to assign three times as many soldiers to protect them.

An eminent writer, mocking the heavily armed settlers' insistence on their God-given right to remain, said: "But they don't trust God, either. I wouldn't evacuate them. I'd pull out the army and see what they really believe."

Hebron is only the first of a long list of obligations under the Oslo agreements yet to be met, decisive for the Palestinian National Authority's ability to maintain its own people's support. And then come the real brain-crunching issues of final status negotiations and the new state which Palestinians demand and Mr. Netanyahu says will never be.

The hawks attack both opposition liberals and Mr. Netanyahu for undermining or circumventing the army. "To win a war, we need a general staff that regards the Arabs as enemies, not as friends or partners," wrote Yohanan Ramati in the Jerusalem Post. The doves say the army is being abused with the wrong tasks, and both worry about polls showing a sharp drop in customary high motivation among the troops. A scarcely political photographer said with a shudder: "Those people are Israelis and they speak Hebrew, but I don't feel I belong to the same nation. I'm coming to feel my state is the state of Tel Aviv." He spoke of civil war, took it back as an exaggeration, and then went on and repeated the danger of civil war among Jews several times.

A distinguished journalist, noted for bravery, said he had not been frightened during Israel's other wars, but now he has a nightmare about the survival of the country if things go on this way.

There are wide complaints about lack of leadership and of a clear sense of how Mr. Netanyahu plans to fulfill his pledge of "peace with security," Gideon Raphael, a retired diplomat who held high rank, calls the prime minister "a mix of Walter Mitty and Rambo, but without Walter Mitty's innocence and Rambo's strength."

"Does it require an enemy, a hostile mobilising pressure, for Jewishness to survive, or rather the moral, compassionate culture that yearns for peace and dignity?"

A young woman, a professor of literature and enthusiastic participant in dialogue with Arabs to "demonstrate" relations, says: "We secular liberals are too passive. The militant nationalists are aggressive, but we don't want to take up arms to fight for our view."

Peace is the big issue, but it has got mixed up in the issue of religious authority in the predominantly secular Jewish state. The fairly recent alliance of nationalists and orthodox gives the religious groups greatly enhanced power and visibility. The non-religious feel they are threatened with oppression, rather like what moderate Muslims feel about their fundamentalists.

They are all Zionists, but the question is arising about the very meaning of the Jewish state and the core of Jewish identity. The original Zionist idea was to provide the Jewish people with a homeland where they could be comfortably themselves, free of persecution, living as a "normal" nation. But beneath the unchallenged requirement of security lies that question of identity. Does it require an enemy, a hostile mobilising pressure, for Jewishness to survive, or rather the moral, compassionate culture that yearns for peace and dignity? Until now there has always been an enemy, so the question was hypothetical. It is becoming substantive and painful. The divisions are not just the lively tradition of argument. They are existential, about what kind of future Israel seeks.

Society on the Move

Promoting Jordan is the order of the day

HRH Crown Prince Hassan, the Regent, will meet today at the Higher Council for Science and Technology with a large group of private and semi-government sector representatives to coordinate Jordan's participation at an important international forum. Prince Hassan will be top billed next week among current and former prime ministers from Mauritius to Israel, ministers from Hong Kong to Chile, multinational businessmen from the Netherlands to the U.K. and CNN talk show host Larry King at the annual Global Panel conference at the Hague, to discuss this year's theme "The Need for a Grand Design: Multiple Perspectives on a Changing World," with a special session on Jordan. Scheduled to take place Tuesday and Wednesday at the Hague in the Netherlands, the conference will have a special session on Wednesday night and Thursday in Aachen, Germany. Global Panel is a conference during which international developments in the political, economic, and social spheres are discussed at the highest level by opinion leaders and decision-makers. The organizer of the panel is the European Research Centre (ERC), an independent Dutch organisation with international experience. For eight consecutive years, the panel has proved to be an inspiring meeting place for business people, politicians, and academics. It is supported by the international business community, the Dutch government, and the European Union. Dutch Minister for Foreign Trade Anneke van Dok-van Woele acts as president of Global Panel. The organisation has hosted, among other dignitaries, His Majesty King Hussein, Palestinian President Yasser Arafat, former U.S. Presidents Jimmy Carter and George Bush, former President of the former Soviet Union Mikhail Gorbachev, Argentine President Carlos Menem, President Robert Mugabe of Kenya and former U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger.

This year Global Panel will host among others President of Mauritius Cassam Uteem, Prime Minister of Malaysia Dr. Mahathir Ben Mohammad, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and former Prime Minister of Netherlands Ruud Lubbers. With the special country-oriented session on "Jordan: Gateway to the Middle East and North Africa," the Jordanian team accompanying the Crown Prince includes a large group of businessmen. The Jordanian participation is seen in terms of the Kingdom being a major regional player in the global economy, and as having a key role in establishing and maintaining regional peace and security. What the business team will try to impress upon other conference attendees is that through continuing economic growth and low inflation, Jordan seeks to promote foreign investment, joint ventures, and policies of technology transfer in major industrial sectors such as agriculture, machinery, chemicals and pharmaceuticals. They will also highlight the priority given to conserving and expanding water resources. Needless to say, tourism and infrastructure will figure high on the Jordan agenda.

THE MAKING OF DIPLOMATS: With the blessing of the Crown Prince, as initiator and chairman of the Institute for Diplomacy (ID), academicians also are looking at Jordan as a gateway to their interests. The memorandum of understanding signed this week between the ID, represented by its President Dr. Mazen Armouti, and the Damascus-based Arab Centre for Strategic Studies (ACSS), headed by former Yemeni President Ali Nasser Mohammad, works to enhance the mandates of both organisations is several ways. As a multi-functional institute the ID aims basically to conduct research and studies, solely and jointly with other institutions focusing on international affairs, in order to enhance and improve Jordan's external communication and exchange of information in the fields of strategic and international studies. Here, Dr. Armouti, who is also an advisor to the Crown Prince, explains that by strategic, the ID and other like institutes look at strategic in a wider context than the earlier and narrower perspective on various forms of national security. But the priority of the ID is to graduate qualified, well-rounded diplomats and others working in the field of international relations. Other functions include conducting national and international conferences and seminars and establishing a database on Jordanian external relations. Similarly, the ACC has a basic function of research which fits the ID's think-tank function. The ID's programme of affiliation has brought it together with numerous institutes and centres for research, training and academic involvement, such as Institut des Sciences Politiques (Science PO) and Universidad Complutense in Madrid. The institute is looking into affiliation with Georgetown University in Washington, D.C. and the Vienna Diplomatic Academy. Meanwhile the ID is a corporate member of two London-based institutes, the International Institute of Strategic Studies (Chatham House), and Royal United Services Institute (RUSI). The memorandum between the ID and the ACSS adds weight to the Damascus centre's forthcoming presence in Amman. The centre, in fact, will establish a branch in Amman, as well as in Oman, and the United Arab Emirates. Mr. Mohammad announced during the signing ceremony Monday that His Majesty King Hussein had donated a plot of land for the purpose of constructing a building to house the ACC's Amman branch. Meanwhile, questions were raised as to why the ID would involve itself in organising cultural exhibitions as the two which ran simultaneously at the ID building last week. To those queries Dr. Armouti responded that the exhibition of photos by Arab-American artist Lilly Bandoq and the exhibition of calligraphy of the Arab and Islamic worlds are events the ID is very pleased to host because they carry the important ingredient of inter-cultural communication, plus they have a regional flavour. "Although on the outset they may appear outside the domain of the ID's work, they actually do fit in and help our students enhance their own appreciation of arts and culture which will serve them as future diplomats."

PROVING THEM WRONG: Already having served as a diplomat, Khalil Othman, it would appear, has some rather potent powers of persuasion. When he was first appointed as an inspector of the United Nations Specialised Agencies in Geneva, U.N. authorities were at the time about to shut down the unit. But a paper presented by Dr. Othman in which he was critical of some aspects of the U.N. administrative departments prompted officials to prolong the life of the unit. Four years and two re-elections later, Dr. Othman has just begun his third two-year term, and he is vice-chairman of the unit. In his early 50s, Dr. Othman received his Ph.D. in political economics at the London School of Economics. He began his career at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and was posted to Jordan's embassy in London and to the Kingdom's mission at the United Nations in New York. Hailing from Beit Safafa, a town partitioned between Israel and Jordan after the 1948 Arab-Israeli War and now part of Greater Jerusalem, Dr. Othman later made a career change to the U.N. starting with a post at the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) in Kuwait then afterwards in the former Yugoslavia. He returned to Amman and continued with the UNDP. Dr. Othman is married to Hind Al Khutib who works as a consultant in children's affairs for the U.N. Although he returns to Jordan periodically for visits, it is expected that after this two-year term he will be back in Jordan for good.

WHAT A DEAL! Another appointment of a sort has been sealed back here in Amman. Jordan Hotel and Tourism Company (JHTC) invited officials of the InterContinental Hotel chain to a dinner last night at which a contract renewal document was signed calling for the continuation of InterContinental management of the landmark hotel until the year 2007. The amended contract stipulates that InterContinental has agreed to reduce its management fees from 3 per cent of gross revenue and 15 per cent of gross operating profit to 2 per cent of gross revenue and 10 per cent of gross operating profit. In return the JHTC agreed to go ahead with the renovation and expansion of the hotel and add 125 rooms, bringing the total to 500. Other alterations will include 200 new parking spaces, a new health club, and indoor swimming pool, expansion of the present ballroom from a 1,000-person capacity to 1,400, a new indoor-outdoor banquet facility to accommodate 800 people, a new Lebanese restaurant, a new all-day dining restaurant, a new shopping mall of 25-26 shops, an entire floor of meeting rooms, and of course the renovation and upgrading of kitchen facilities. The company will award the contract for the 125 rooms next week. The hotel facade will get a facelift and the lifts will be upgraded. What was expected by some in terms of a new contract was different in light of all the talk of privatising the country's wholly and partially government-owned establishments, among them the Jordan InterContinental. But it was JHTC Chairman Khalil Talhouni, who many were counting on to purchase the balance of the hotel's government shares through his company Zara, and President for InterContinental Hotels in the Middle East and Africa Raymond Khalife, who signed the contract. According to Mr. Talhouni, negotiations for the purchase of the remaining government shares are in progress, and Zara is in the picture. Personally, he would like to see the government continue as a shareholder, but if policy dictates that privatisation is the way, then the JHTC has no problem with that. The InterContinental began managing this Jabal Amman hotel in 1963 upon request of the Jordanian government, and has been doing so ever since. According to Mr. Khalife, InterContinental does not see itself as merely a manager but considers itself a partner with the hotel, as its success is InterCon's success. About 50 people including ministers, businessmen and the press attended last night's dinner.

HUSH, HE MIGHT HERE YOU: One night earlier on Tuesday other principals from the hospitality industry gathered for an event of pageantry. But with the number of hoteliers attending as newly inducted members of the Chaine des Rois (that 13th century French-born association of gastronomy) and guests, there was much talk of the down-turn in tourism in 1996. Fortunately the complaints were not made within earshot of Minister of Tourism Saleh Irshaidat who was seated at the table of honour with their Royal Highnesses Prince Ali Bin Nayef, Princess Wijdan, and their daughters Princesses Rajwa and Basma. "But Mövenpick Resort General Manager in Petra Robert Fierz was undeterred, his career in the industry has taken him to some rather "hot spots" of the world and he has somehow managed to maintain good humour and optimism about the prospects of turning a bad season into a boom season. Meanwhile the Chaine has opened its Jordan Chapter with Regency Palace hotelier Said Sawalha as president, and its Paris-based President Robert Pary commented that he was particularly delighted to have Jordan join this august assemblage as it was one of the few countries that could count a queen among its members — Her Majesty Queen Noor is honorary member. Among the other members in various categories are head of the chapter and Royal Jordanian Vice President for Investments Akel Biltaji, Diana Ghaleb, Samir and Nabil Sawalha (all connected to the hotel industry in some way) and Adnan Habbob of Royal Jordanian.

PRIVATE SCREENING: Those most responsible for promoting tourism in Jordan were testing a new product Wednesday. At the Ministry of Tourism a small group of concerned persons was invited to review rough copies of a film produced to promote Jordan as a tourism destination. The production was a joint effort between the Italian film-producing company called Filmgo and a local counter-part called Katy Film. What was shown were a 10-minute track, five short spots, and a 12-minute track omitting the script. Critique first complimented the professionalism, quality and technical skill reflected in the films which were shot on 16 mm film rather than poorer quality video. But then it moved to small yet important points, particularly the apparent over-emphasis on Bedouin life and other scenes that a tourist may be attracted to but may never actually experience on a trip to the Kingdom. While recognising and acknowledging the points being made, Filmgo representative Renata Tardini took note of what could or should be altered, but also did a good job of defending the work of the films' director in having an eye and ear for a more physical sense of beauty, excitement and novelty that would sell to the target European and Southeast Asian tourist. So it is not exactly "back to the drawing board" but perhaps a few days of review, editing, piecing in and correcting and then a new screening. We will be waiting.

SO WHERE'S THE HOST? With the representative of the European Delegation in Jordan Yves Gazzo, taking time out for entertainment is part of the job. Mr. Gazzo had a full house Sunday at the Prince Hassan Auditorium for the European Union Chamber Orchestra Concert. A photo by the Jordan News Agency, Petra, was printed in the local press, showing an empty chair between HRH Princess Aliya Faisal, who attended on behalf of Her Majesty Queen Noor, and Hanan Gharaibeh, wife of University of Jordan President Fawzi Gharaibeh. Protocol seating would have placed Mr. Gazzo in that vacant seat, but the photo led some who did not attend the concert to presume that Mr. Gazzo was indeed not there. But alas, he was. It is just that the photo was taken when Mr. Gazzo was on stage making introductions. Still the EU representative had been travelling and had arrived back in Amman in the nick of time to make the concert. His earlier journey took him to France, and not Japan as was previously rumoured. He went to say good-bye to his eldest son Alexis who was leaving for Morocco where he would be doing his military/civil service. Mr. Gazzo then headed to Brussels on business before returning to Amman. He too noticed the omission from the Petra photo, but understood.

MEDIA MOVES: At a seminar last night organised by the Arab Club for Culture and Art journalists took up the subject of what could be considered a "press drain," the "Arab Media Abroad." Taking part in this seminar were journalists from two London-based Arabic dailies, Mufeed Awad from Sharq Al Awsat and Salameh Ne'matt from Al Haya. Fawzi Bandari, from the Paris-based weekly Al Watan Al Arabi, was scheduled on the programme as well but ended up a no-show. Moderated by Mohammad Sharif Jayousi, a member of the club, the two journalists attempted to explain what some view as the "voyage" of Arab journalism, while others see it as the "defection" of Arab newspapers to the west. They spoke about why such papers decided to publish outside the Arab World, and more specifically what political, economic and logistical conditions may have motivated such a move.

PRESS PARTY: On the home front the Foreign Press Club, headed by Agence France Presse Amman Bureau Chief Randa Habib, will host a reception on Dec. 5 at the Philadelphia Hotel on the occasion of establishing the club for foreign correspondents in Jordan. The club's members were ineligible for membership in the Jordan Press Association, and thus were prompted, along with other reasons, to form their own grouping. Although activity in the Foreign Press Club has been unhurried at best, the hosting of next week's reception may help to get the ball rolling say members and local hacks.

BACK TO SHIHAN: One journalist who is not a member of the Foreign Press Club, simply by virtue of working for a strictly local tabloid, is Raja Talab. Mr. Talab, 32, has become editor-in-chief of Shihan weekly, replacing Jihad Momani who bolted to Al Bilad where he became publisher Nayef Tarwara's partner. Mr. Talab has served as managing editor of the naughty tabloid from 1991 to 1994. He then moved to another weekly, Al Bilad, as chief editor, then moved again to Al Hadeth weekly where he shared the title of deputy editor with Nidal Mansour. Mr. Talab intends to change policy at Shihan, but not in the direction of becoming a partisan paper. He believes that when he managed the paper earlier there were better scoops and wider coverage. He thinks he can do it again. Mr. Talab said he prefers weeklies for the "ceiling of freedom" they offer. He also believes that Shihan's street influence is nothing to sneeze at. And, besides, his position offers a better remuneration package. In the meantime, he owns 10 per cent of Al Hadeth and intends to keep them for the time being.

HEALTH ADVANCES: Over at the Arab Centre for Heart and Special Surgery, Dr. Daoud Hanania last week invited another guest surgeon to lecture on special surgical procedures and perform related operations on several of the hospital's patients. The surgeon in question is Dr. Rendas Batista of Brazil, who described a new procedure for end-stage heart disease patients, that is, those people with intractable heart failure and who are usually offered little hope other than undergoing a human heart transplant operation. Dr. Batista's procedure involves reducing the size of the heart in the left ventricle, thus "helping to prolong the quality and length of life of the patient." The success of this operation is rendering it acceptable now in most countries of the world, said Dr. Hanania, who first saw Dr. Batista's work about three years ago in Boston. While he was in Jordan, Dr. Batista conducted six operations; there were five Jordanian patients and one Yemeni patient. Their ages ranged from 14 to 60. One patient died following surgery; the other five are recovering "quite well." The Brazilian surgeon was assisted by a team of Jordanian specialists led by Dr. Hanania. This same Jordanian team will now be conducting this procedure, where indicated. Dr. Batista also conducted another "revolutionary" procedure called auto-transplantation, on a Jordanian woman. It involved removing the heart, doing the necessary [repair], and then re-implanting it.

In the pocket

SMALL IS beautiful. Perfectly aware of this the computer industry is now offering three categories of machines, called "sub-computers," that are smaller than the standard size PC that sits on your desk top. In spite of their ever increasing power and numerous features, none of them however has so far succeeded in catching up with the popularity and the sales record of their big brother, except maybe for the smallest of them.

Notebooks are about the size of an A4 sheet of paper (width and length) but are two inches thick. Their main strength is their technical characteristics — practically the same as regular PCs. Users do not have to sacrifice processing power or disk storage with notebooks. Virtually any task that requires a full size PC can be done with a notebook. Their weaknesses: They are expensive, have a limited power autonomy when running on batteries and they still weigh three to five kilograms. However they are becoming more popular every year.

Palmtop computers are smaller and lighter than notebooks. Their dimension and weight are about half of notebooks. Because of that important features have to be left out. Generally speaking they offer reduced performance compared to notebooks or PCs and they remain very expensive. This is the least popular of the "sub-computers" categories.

The third and last category is also the fastest growing one. Called PIMs (Personal Information Managers) these machines present a major and obvious advantage over all other classes: They actually fit in a shirt's pocket. How much power and how many features are sacrificed to make a PIM so small a computer?

Although they truly deserve the name "computer" PIMs must not be compared with PCs. Contrary to notebooks and palmtop machines that use the same operating software as PCs (DOS, Windows, etc.) and therefore greatly simplify the whole process to the users, PIMs have their own operating systems. There is still no standard defined to operate these tiny computers. For practicality and consistency, their designers try to keep all commands as close as possible to what is found on bigger equipment.

Weighing between 100 and 500 grammes only, PIMs have a memory capacity of 32 KB (kilobyte or thousand characters) up to 512 KB. While memory in a PC is volatile (clears all data it contains when the machine is switched off) it is not in PIMs. Because it has no disk storage, a PIM retains any data or character that is entered in its memory, even when it is turned off.

Most PIMs come with a set of programmes that make a perfect electronic diary. A telephone and address book, a memo zone to write short notes, a scheduler for appointments and of course a calculator. Some offer direct printing to regular office computer printers. The first reason why people buy them is the extremely practical phone and address book, with lightning fast search possibility. The most important feature of PIMs is the "PC link" which consists of a cable and accompanying software that lets users connect them to a desk top PC. One advantage is obvious: You can enter large amounts of data from the PC, in the comfort of the large screen and full size keyboard, and then transfer data to the PIM. The second advantage is no less important: The same link allows you to make a back up on PC of all the data stored in the PIM and that you wouldn't like to lose.

The most sophisticated models offer real word processing, spreadsheet programmes and even the possibility to access your E-mail. Six manufacturers, mainly, are fighting for the PIM market: Hewlett-Packard, Apple, Epson, Casio, Psion and Sharp. Several models were presented two weeks ago at the METS show in Jordan. Prices were ranging from JD 100 to JD 350. Options and accessories remain very expensive. If you think of acquiring a modern card or additional memory for a PIM, you may end up paying two to three times its original price.

PIMs or electronic diaries may beat all other "sub-computers" in a couple of years. While their size and weight will most likely remain what they are now — their main strength after all — PIMs will be given more memory and processing power. Once they can hold a few megabytes more, people may prefer them to notebooks or palmtops. In spite of their small key tops, uncomfortable for big fingers, and a display reduced to 10 lines x 40 characters for most models, their "pocketability" constitutes an offer one cannot refuse. On your desk a PC and in your pocket a PIM with all the essential data you need from the PC, doesn't it sound attractive?

WHO'S WHO?

THE SON of a fish porter, he began years of struggle as a small-part actor after several dead-end jobs and national service. Tall and fair, he has been much mimicked because of his Cockney drawl. In 1983 he played a dissolute English professor opposite Julie Walters. His autobiography was released six years ago. He was born in March, 1933. Can you name this Piscean?

THOUGHTS FOR THIS WEEK

- It is easier to make a saint out of a libertine than out of a prig.
— George Santayana, Spanish-born philosopher (1863-1952).
- Since when was genius found respectable?
— Elizabeth Barrett Browning, English poet (1806-1861).
- The best of all the preachers are the men who live their creeds.
— Edgar A. Guest, American author, journalist and poet (1881-1959).
- Do not look back. And not dream about the future, either. It will neither give you back the past, nor satisfy your other daydreams. Your duty, your reward — your destiny — are here and now.
— Dag Hammarskjöld, U.N. Secretary-General (1905-1961).

The good thing, the mad thing and the sure thing

By Samer Ghaleb Bagaeen

IF YOU cannot face the busy, well, sort of busy, streets this Christmas, mail order shopping is the obvious thing for you. Where do you start? A new book Christmas Made Easy is the thing for you. It is also an invaluable source of inspirational presents for birthdays, christenings and weddings too.

This book can be obtained from any good bookshop, if you can find one that is.

You cannot but have heard about the thousands of security guards who had been recruited to prevent disruption at the Miss World Contest in Bangalore, India, by angry feminists, some of whom had threatened to set fire to themselves.

Surely enough, a 25-year-old student had earlier torched himself to death in protest against the contest. Also, four bombs were found at contest sites.

Fearing further unrest, a local judge agreed that the competition be allowed to take place providing that no indecent exposure, nudity, or obscenity took place.

I am sorry, I know that this will upset a few world views, distress some handwringing pessimists and affront those social conservatives who just know that the world is going to the dogs. But, I cannot but report this truth: There is some good news regarding education and schools, and it has nothing to do with teaching.

It comes in two sets of recently published social studies cutting through the fashionable positions which state that there is nothing government can do about social malfunction or educational failure. One of the surveys had to do with a programme which was structured for teaching 13- and 14-year-olds how to think. The programme actually raised the students' performance.

Now, even though we cannot tell for sure which schooling methods produce what results and how teachers can be trained to be better, we can at least say that a diversity of schooling in a spirit of aggressive optimism seems to be the way forward.

This we need to do because the realities on the ground are quite startling. For example, in a recent design project discussion at one of our universities, it was surprising to note that very, very few students were either willing or able to engage in an exchange of ideas about how to structure and represent an idea in physical terms.

A thrilling performance awarded with thunderous applause was what the European Union Chamber Orchestra offered us a few days ago at the Prince Hassan Auditorium of the University of Jordan.

Congratulations are due to all those who made sure that this event had taken place. Meanwhile, we live in the hope that such events will continue to take place in the future.

Can there ever be an end to some peoples' repulsive snobbery and petty, aristocratic airs and graces? Thankfully, yes there can be.

Firm action and giving power to 'little people' is one way to put an end to such behaviour. Another is down to individual choice where all you do is warn people of the dangers and let them get on with this. This would be the only thing that can guarantee your sanity.

RENDEZVOUS WITH ART

'Old curiosity shop' puts pride back in our cultural heritage

Quite a bit more than a cosy and genial corner shop, Al Aydi Craft Development Centre is a cultural-preservation project with a social conscience, ushering a renaissance in Jordanian artisanship through a programme of human development

By Mahmoud I. Mufti

"SINCE TIME began, Man has felt the need to enrich his world aesthetically. Ways of achieving this have varied, but Man slowly began to shape things around him to fit his own needs and ideas. On this great land, generation after generation of people have not only lived but have also contributed and excelled in their contributions towards beautifying their everyday surroundings. Their greatness is witnessed everywhere in this beautiful country.

The glory of the past has acted as an inspiration for the present, for this land — inspiring men to produce the sculptural forms of Petra, the columns of Jerash, and the desert castles — is still endearing its people to create," comments former Jordanian ambassador, Laurie Hlass.

Recognising the aesthetic reserves and creative talents abounding in Jordan, a small but dedicated band of women sought to harness and promote — starting in the early 70s — these national treasures that are embedded in our cultural heritage. Though from different walks of life and possessing of different talents, those individuals shared a vision for cultural preservation and promotion through a programme of human development that would truly bring out the full lustre of what Jordanian craft can offer, benefiting the craftsmen themselves, placing Jordan on the world-map of fine artisanship — and perhaps, most importantly — contributing to the renaissance of a once-more-prevalent and tragic stigma associated with anything local (while longingly looking to imported objects of art as, virtually, the sole "home-beautifiers").

Engendering this pioneering effort was the Beirut College for Women's (BUC) Alumni Club of Amman. Mrs. Abia Kassar was its president, and Ms. Janet Said Al Mufti its vice president. Members included her Royal Highness Princess Widad Ali, Ms. Hind Nasser, Ms. Nujud Fawzi, Ms. Zeena Rodenko, Ms. Widad Kassar, among others. The club launched off with a flurry of intense and topical cultural activities, even though it had very few members at the time, compared to about 500 now. "Our activities were really of a relatively massive scale," says co-founder Mrs. Widad Kassar, "quite disproportionate to our number and institutional infrastructure. Nonetheless, each time new members joined, year by year, our efforts were invigorated and our resolve strengthened. While pushing our programmes through with vigour, we nevertheless almost always maintained a keen eye as to where we held such events; not anywhere would do. Recognising the value of 'location-specific symbolism' and the promotional value it could potentially generate, we selected the old Amman Municipality building in the downtown (near the Roman Amphitheatre). Our anticipation was met with actual results: many people gathered there, and the functions became synonymous with our first taste of success. Successive perks of this nature followed, playing an instrumental role in infusing us with the self-confidence we needed — both as individuals and as a whole — and in demonstrating to us the critical importance of working as a team, coordinating everything together."

The club's lecture-themes ranged from economics, antiquities, the mayorship of Amman, etc. Meeting with virtually runaway success and public support of their programmes, the members found themselves well-poised to start conceiving of an educational programme, whereby they would send students to college, since it was always the understanding that every alumni branch of the BUC would assist students in Lebanon. Accordingly, they started forwarding tuition-fees to Beirut to cover the scholarship-expenses of a number of students enrolling at the BUC (initially known as Junior College, then the BUC, and currently the Beirut College for Women). And so came into being one of Beirut's/Lebanon's first alumni clubs, preceded only by the likes of the well-established and formidable American University of Beirut's alumni association, then headed by Mr. Farid Al Sa'ad.

With the passage of time, the club-members felt that although they would not altogether abandon scholarship-schemes in Lebanon, they would restrict them to two students annually, and divert the remaining funds to sponsor students in Jordan. They had reached a critical juncture in the club's progression at that time as they came to the realisation that they would remain limited to an embryonic scholarship-scheme unless they innovated a fund-generating apparatus that would be within their capabilities to create, and more importantly, within their means to sustain and expand. It was out of this that the idea of a 'Craft Shop' was conceived. However, with the total absence of the necessary capital, the club nominated members to a committee that would be entrusted with the task of studying the feasibility of such a project. Among the pioneers were Mrs. Hind Nasser, Ms. Yusra Owaida, Mrs. Widad Kassar and others.

What followed was an exhaustive one-year 'sweeping survey' of what crafts were actually being produced throughout the Kingdom, commencing in Amman, Madaba and Salt. The methodology was rather rudimentary but highly effective; the committee-members asked around 'who did what,' and literally went from door-to-door, visiting the artisans and crafts-people. For instance, they identified crocheted-work in Madaba and other artistic disciplines elsewhere. "A few of us who really believed in the ultimate viability of the project had to endure sceptics' remarks which did — admittedly, at times — affect our morale. We remained steadfast nonetheless. What really helped was that we were personally enamoured with the crafts. And so we persevered, warding off a seemingly self-rejuvenating plethora of obstacles that would have otherwise clouded our final objective. Our aim was to establish a revenue-yielding enterprise that would support our activities and a significantly-expanded scholarship scheme, as well as help the crafts-people in Jordan," disclosed Widad Kassar.

The first year was undoubtedly their hardest, invested in identifying various craft-sources and hoptrotting all over the country wherever they heard of someone making candles, children's clothing, brassware, jewellery, embroideries, ceramics, etc. Soon, with their network rapidly increasing, it became essential to find an affordable place that would serve as the centre of their unified efforts. Suitable premises were soon found in the heart of Jabal Amman, at the 2nd Circle, but they weren't affordable. Remedying the situation was the late Sharif Nasser, who donated a car on which lottery-tickets were drawn. The vehicle's actual value of five or six thousand dinars was significantly exceeded in terms of the lottery's resultant funds, consequently making possible the renting and inauguration of the new centre's initial functioning for two whole years (inclusive of the stocking up of the shop and the hiring of two employees).

The ladies' hard work paid off and was matched by good fortune; by any account, they got off to a spectacular start. "We finally had a place that doubled up as a shop and 'headquarters', so to speak, where our committee-members would start receiving and meeting with artisans and crafts-people," says Mrs. Kassar.

Miss. Salma Ne'meh, a committee-member of club, was entrusted with the design-aspects. She was a professional interior-designer who volunteered her services, designing, among other things, the Centre's interior. The institutional infrastructure was finally viable and functioning. Revenues started being registered and the new goal was to accord special attention to the artisans themselves, bringing them out 'into the open' and supporting them. The aim was not only to make money, but to help the crafts-people. Such a trend was theretofore unprecedented in Jordan, and it was the Crafts Centre that pioneered such a scheme. The artisans began to feel that — in contrast to merely drawing a trickle of heritage-admirers among individuals and shopkeepers — they were now centre-stage in the consideration of an organised, specialised body: the BUC's Crafts Centre. Artisans could come and display their wares, pending adequate quality-standards. Some of today's prominent artisans were among those early fledgling craftsmen of the early seventies.

The Centre pursued a policy of displaying crafts-exhibits in the presence of the artisans who produced them; it wanted to bring the crafts-people in direct contact with members of the public. It had come to the realisation of the centre's staff that the wholesale handicrafts-merchants went to great lengths to keep the artisans nameless, faceless and totally anonymous, effectively exploiting them into selling them their work unreasonably cheaply and then reselling it themselves, often making ten-fold the profit of the artisans. The absence in Jordan, (prior to that time), of an organised marketing and promotion institution — such as the BUC's Crafts Centre came to be — enabled such practices to pass unchecked. Predictably, the detriment befell the consumer and the producer, benefiting only the middlemen and wholesale merchants.

With the advent of the Centre, those days rapidly met their demise; artisans were being put in direct contact with prospective clientele, with minimal profit-margins for the centre. Moreover, the public were not only invited to meet the crafts-people and their products, but were encouraged to visit the centre and see the artisans actually at work. They could talk to them and ask them questions while they worked. One distinct example involved a clay-potter working at his wheel, right before the public. Countless similar set-ups were arranged with artisans of different crafts: glass-blowers, brass and silver-smiths, carpet-weavers, embroiderers, wood-carvers, etc.

Inevitably, the rising demand for heritage-crafts and the constant emergence of qualified crafts-people necessitated the project's expansion. It was at that point that the view of progressing beyond the BUC's auspices was adopted. Contacts were accordingly made by Ms. Hind Nasser and other members with the Development & Industrial Bank, who already had a policy (and department) dedicated to supporting crafts-people. The bank agreed to put some money aside for the project. Royal Jordanian (airlines) and the JETT tourist-bus company were approached with similar motives, (the idea being to enlist the financial support of key tourism-related private & public sector enterprises).

These mega-enterprises stipulated the conversion of the Crafts Centre — theretofore strictly a non-profit welfare association — into a full-fledged profit-realising, share-holding company, since none of them were advocates of traditional philanthropy. Accordingly, each of the three enterprises came to possess shares, though (in order to incorporate the private sector more convincingly), ten private citizens of means were asked to contribute JD 500 each.

The outcome was the emergence of a financially secure company with a healthy capital. This was to usher in a new thriving phase in the once-embryonic 'human-development-through-cultural-revival-project.' The Crafts Centre had metamorphosed into a registered company comprised of the original BUC Alumni Club, Royal Jordanian, the Development & Industrial Bank, the JETT Company, as well as the ten private shareholders. The latter included the Nazzari family, Haj Ali Dajani of the Chamber of Trade (one of the foremost supporters), Mrs. Zahra Mango and Mr.

Tony Soussa.

However, far from reaping dividends alone, the centre's new status as a company attracted the prohibitively-depleting arm of the Income Tax Department, which excised up to 30% of the profits. To avoid sinking under, the newly-spawned crafts-company had to revise its entire pricing structure. They had to change their entire institutional matrix to cope with their new reality, effectively forcing them to reeducate themselves in legal, auditing and administrative matters since the liability-free days of their former charitable organisation. Their new commitments to a multitude of parties posed a real, almost critical, challenge.

The new era's responsibilities included the formation of a board of trustees, a committee of advisors, a consulting committee (that included artist Samia Zaru, Her Excellency Ambassador Laurie Hlass, Ms. Hind Nasser and others). Auditorial supervision of an on-location accountant from the Development & Industrial Bank was also instituted. Selected to run the company were Ms. Barbara Nasri Atallah and Ms. Abia Kassar, who jointly undertook to lay down the necessary corporate foundations. It was the transition from welfare to corporate status that heralded a move from the old premises at the 2nd Circle to a larger house in the same general area, formerly home to the late Fawzi Al-Mufti.

"Providing invaluable guidance and corporate know-how during the formation-process of the company was Mr. Ziad Annab, Director General of the Development & Industrial Bank. He actually took time off and taught us like students. Our company fit the bank's criteria for financial and other support, given that it entailed human development. This was an area in which the bank was particularly active, and thus contributed a considerable sum (for the early 70's) to the tune of JD18,000 or so. The bank also strove to demonstrate to donor states the extent to which well-conceived and well-managed small enterprises can, in fact, go a long way in improving the lot of artisans and crafts-people here in Jordan," expounded Mrs. Kassar, adding that: "It was a human development programme in the fullest sense; a project for us and a project for the bank: a very good symbiosis."

Surprisingly, the tourist industry proved a rather ineffectual source of revenue for the company; the pattern of tourist movement and behaviour provided for haphazard purchases, at best. They tended to visit in large buses, more often than not crowding the shop and taking a long time to buy small scattered items. Furthermore, the local bus drivers and guides would demand an exorbitant 25% on all collective purchases, while leaving the shop unable to raise prices proportionately in compensation. However, tourists coming as individuals did not pose the same dilemma. It became clear that it did not pay to concentrate on group-tourists. Rather, the prime targeted clientele became local residents, who would visit time and again, as well as non-Jordanians in diplomatic missions, etc.

"Locals started developing a taste for rustic and authentic elements found in Jordanian handicrafts, using them to beautify their homes and gardens in place of imported goods. This pattern of awareness and active choice signalled the onset of the erosion of long-held stigmas vis-a-vis local artisanship. Jordanians started abandoning their apologetic stance and scepticism regarding domestic handicrafts; in fact, what started setting in was a situation where people's pride started finding its way back into the complex matrix of national heritage. The pride was back. People progressively began taking joy in items produced or found in Jordan," explained the Aydi's new Director, Mrs. May Khoury.

Today, the fruit of two decades of labour, patience, imagination and love, the Jordan Craft Development Centre, "Al Aydi," enjoys regional and international renown as a centre dedicated to the principle and practice of human development through cultural preservation. The Aydi — (meaning 'hands' in Arabic, to both honour the craftsman's creative hands and to ward off the evil eye) — stands as a testament to the vision and relentless hard work of a now-familiar "small band of women" who nurtured a dream into reality, introducing the rich and crucial dimension of a crafts-oriented national-heritage renaissance in our cosy Jordanian society; a programme with a social conscience, helping more than 80 artisan-families. Yet, to the curious passer-by or the unsuspecting visitor, the Aydi shop still exudes that snug and reassuring aura of the genial corner shop; all the more so, now with the Christmas season round the corner. And though the notion of "corners" features prominently in the overall context, the Aydi guarantees that "no corners are cut" in either quality or originality of exhibits on display. Merry Christmas.

Spielberg joins influx of filmmakers to New Zealand

By Victoria Batchelor Reuter

WELLINGTON — When Steven Spielberg decided to film part of the sequel to the dinosaur thriller Jurassic Park in New Zealand, he joined a growing line of international filmmakers beating a path to these shores.

From Hercules to King Kong, a growing number of projects are being financed or filmed by overseas companies which have recognised New Zealand's potential as a movie-making location.

Foreign directors say magnificent and easily accessible scenery, cheaper costs and high quality, English-speaking film crews are the drawcards which make shooting here so attractive.

"The light is beautiful — the best I've seen — and you have every kind of landscape. The crew, actors and creative talents are world-class," American-born Paris-based director Bob Swaim told Onfilm magazine while filming here in September.

Swaim was filming The Climb, starring British actor John Hurt. It is part of a 120 million New Zealand dollars ($85 million) deal signed this year between New Zealand's Isambard Productions, French film company Canal Plus and Canada's Allegro.

Next year, cinemagoers worldwide will see the rainforests, granite peaks and giant waterfalls of the South Island's Fiordland region as the scenic backdrop to Spielberg's The Lost World: Jurassic Park.

"Certainly, in a film of this kind, we had the option of shooting just about anywhere in the world and after looking... the area in New Zealand was deemed to be absolutely the best," said the film's publicist, Don Levy.

"A lot of us have worked here before and we know New Zealand technicians and cameramen are very good — renowned," said Scott Easton, production manager for Spielberg's production company, Amblin Entertainment.

But talk of New Zealand as a new Hollywood is premature, Tom Parkinson of Isambard Productions told Reuters.

"New Zealand has probably only done about four feature films this year. Well, that's just a breath compared to other places.

"It seems large for this country mainly because it has been a cottage industry and has only just woken up to being professional," said Parkinson, whose company is involved in productions with partners from Hong Kong, Britain, Germany, France, Canada and the United States.

Foreign investment in the local film-production industry amounted to 39.4 per cent of the total 175 million New Zealand dollars spent on such productions in 1995, but room for further growth is seen.

To help with the growing demand, the local industry set up a new body, film New Zealand, a year ago to provide a direct line of information for offshore companies. "What they don't know about is our industry capabilities... they ask me how advanced we are, what the state of our technology is," Film New Zealand Executive Director Di Oliver said.

"Part of what I do when I go away is to talk to them about New Zealand and say 'yes we do have this technology. Yes, we do have electricity. Yes we do have fax machines,'" she laughed.

International film companies tend to bring their key creative staff to New Zealand initially, but may then switch to local employees, Oliver said.

"There are some productions, such as Hercules and Xena: Princess Warrior, that have been here for over two years. They are now using more of our key creatives, because they've gotten to know our capabilities. They are even using some of our directors.

"Xena and Hercules have done wonders in training New Zealand film crews," Oliver said of the two action television series created by the American company Renaissance Films and shot here since 1993. Both are popular in the United States.

New Zealand, which this year celebrates a century of movie-making, has experienced a recent resurgence in local film productions with Once Were Warriors, The Piano and Heavenly Creatures winning international recognition.

New Zealander Peter Jackson, who directed Heavenly Creatures, filmed The Frighteners, starring Michael J. Fox, here last year with financing from Universal Pictures.

Jackson's next project, with partner Fran Walsh, is to produce a new version of the classic King Kong. Also financed by Universal, it will be filmed at Jackson's own special effects facility in New Zealand.

Towards a way to repair knee ligament damage

LIGAMENT AND tendon injuries are becoming increasingly common with growing participation in a variety of physically demanding sports. Clinical interest in such injuries and their repair for an active young population is stimulating a number of research programmes in Britain.

At the forefront of this work is the Interdisciplinary Research Centre (IRC) in Biomedical Materials, based at Queen Mary and Westfield College (QMW), part of the University of London.

Here, researchers led by Dr. Julia Shelton are studying two approaches to knee ligament repair: to provide a permanent "scaffold" for tissue in-growth or a temporary scaffold allowing the body to regenerate its own ligament. In either case the biomechanical properties of the scaffold are fundamental to a successful repair and to ensuring the best biological response.

Our picture shows researcher Zoe Hudson using a combined tension-torsion machine for a test on a model of a human knee joint. The information obtained will help to establish a reliable testing procedure for use on real knee joints eventually.

The project team's aim is ultimately to be able to regenerate the anterior cruciate ligament — the part of the knee that tends to be damaged commonly in sporting injuries — as part of the DTI and EPSRC (Department of Trade and Industry, and Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council) funded LINK research programme in association with the Smith and Nephew company. The ICR at QMW has many state-of-the-art mechanical testing facilities with environmental chambers enabling testing under physiological conditions (the conditions encountered within the body).

It forms a national focus for future development of biomaterials in the U.K., providing an interface between industry, the health services and other research organisations.

As well as aiming to create a new generation of implant materials with enhanced lifetimes, the centre has an important role in biomedical materials with enhanced lifetimes, the centre has an important role in biomedical education and training — London Press Service.

Male angst spurs on hunt for the missing sperm

By A. J. Singh

MUMBAI, India — Ramesh, 26, a healthy and upwardly mobile junior business executive, is a sad man these days.

Married three years ago, he longs to be a father. But doctors in Mumbai (formerly Bombay) say he is unlikely to be able to sire children. Not only is his sperm count low, but his semen contains many dead and defective sperm.

Santosh, a 28-year-old engineer, has also been seeking fertility advice. After six years of marriage, he is without an heir. His sperm count was found to be low but not hopeless. Doctors say it could increase, but this has not happened yet.

Ramesh and Santosh are two of the millions of Indian males who — anxious and frustrated at their failure to impregnate their wives — are doing the rounds of clinics in the hope of finding help.

They are victims of a big fall in sperm counts in India which is worrying many people. Some regard the phenomenon as nature's answer to over-population in a country with close to a billion inhabitants. Others blame it on industrial chemicals in the environment, on oral contraceptives and on modern lifestyles.

Evidence of falling sperm counts around the world is inconclusive and contradictory, with some countries apparently showing an increase. But India has registered a sharp decline. Recent reports suggest the problem is particularly marked among agricultural workers in certain parts of the states of Gujarat and Andhra Pradesh. "What we are observing is only the tip of the iceberg," says Dr. Anand Kumar, a reproductive biologist at the Hope Clinic in Bangalore. Dr. Firoza Parikh, a Mumbai-based gynaecologist who pioneered micromanipulation (injecting a sperm into an egg) in India, says: "Over the past decade, the average fall (in numbers of sperm) could be 15 million per millilitre."

Male fertility is measured by the number of sperm per millilitre of semen. This was found to be 113 million on average in 1938. Now it is about 66 million.

Doctors can find no medical reason for low sperm counts in most cases. Leading infertility specialists Dr. Aniruddha Malpani and Dr. Anjali Malpani — co-authors of a book: Getting Pregnant: A Guide for Infertile Couples — say low sperm count is the cause of infertility among 90 per cent of the couples who consult them.

Aniruddha Malpani, who set up India's first sperm bank five years ago, says: "We are now rejecting nine out of 10 healthy young (prospective donor) men because their sperm counts aren't high."

Experts are also worried about the quality of sperm. A higher percentage of weak, dead and abnormal sperm — sometimes with two heads or two tails — are now found in semen.

Motility (speed and swimming direction of individual sperm cells) and morphology (shape and size) are as important as numbers in the process of conception. "The average motility rate is also on the decline," says Dr. Parveen Kini, a Mumbai specialist. "And the average seminal volume has fallen from 3.7 to 2.5 millilitres."

Weak and malformed sperm stand little chance of fertilising an egg. If they do, the pregnancy can end in miscarriage or a deformed baby.

No-one knows the exact cause for the decline. However, stress, alcohol, smoking, bicycle riding, drug taking, exposure to X-ray radiation and even tight-fitting underwear have all been blamed for disturbing sperm production.

One patient reportedly recovered when he stopped wearing tight briefs. "Testicles perform best when they hang," says Dr. Kini. When the testicles are pulled up, blood temperature in the scrotum rises. "This can damage sperm cells."

Some researchers think the real culprits are chemicals such as pesticides and substances used in the plastics industry, as well as synthetic hormones used in birth-control pills. These can build up in the food chain and water supplies and affect humans, possibly damaging sperm production and fetal development.

British researchers recently suggested that the female hormone oestrogen, naturally discharged by women, was somehow being reactivated in sewage-treatment works and causing male fish living downstream to develop female characteristics.

Environmentalists, meanwhile, have linked pollution to diseases of the male reproductive system and birth defects such as malformed or undersized penises and testes.

Dr. Kumar believes pesticides are responsible for damaging males in rural areas. "Humans are to blame if fertility is going down," he says.

Some doctors think the problem is being exaggerated, while other people find the subject amusing.

Humourist Manu Joseph says: "If it is what you call a biological trend then perhaps my father was half the man my grandfather was. This makes poor me only quarter the man my grandad was."

"True, my father had only two children while my grandfather had eight. But this, I presume, had more to do with the growing popularity of rubber," — Gemini News.

Report sees two-fold increase in skin cancer

By Maggie Fox

Reuter

LONDON — Cases of skin cancer could quadruple by the year 2100 if ozone-depleting chemicals were not restricted, scientists report.

Even with current agreements to reduce production of such chemicals, skin cancer cases will double, they said in a report in the science journal Nature.

Harry Slaper and colleagues at the Netherlands Institute of Public Health and the Environment said their findings showed how important it was to restrict production of such chemicals.

They based their findings on a complex analysis of current cases, skin cancer tests on mice and projections of ozone levels, they wrote in Nature.

A 1985 agreement known as the Vienna Convention set up a framework for reducing production of chemicals that harm the ozone layer. These include chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs), used widely in refrigeration and aerosols.

They react with oxygen in the ozone layer, which protects the Earth from the sun's ultraviolet radiation. Such radiation not only damages crops but causes skin cancer.

So countries agreed to cut chemical production. In 1987 a plan for phasing out production was signed in Montreal — although there have been problems implementing it.

CFC production was banned worldwide in January. But there is still a significant black market in the chemical. For the scenario in which no restrictions were placed on chemicals the researchers assumed a three per cent annual increase in production of CFCs, halons and methyl chloroform. Under Montreal Agreement, production of the five major offenders is supposed to be dropped to 50 per cent by 1999.

"We evaluated the skin cancer types: Squamous cell carcinoma, basal cell carcinoma, the most frequent but least aggressive, and cutaneous malignant melanoma, the least frequent but most aggressive," they wrote.

Skin cancer cases due to ozone depletion would double in the United States under the Montreal Agreement, they found. But they would have more than quadrupled had there been no agreement.

They would grow two per cent if all production of ozone-depleting chemicals had stopped at the end of 1995. Figures were just slightly lower for northwest Europe.

"These results demonstrate the importance of the international measures agreed upon under the Vienna Convention," the researchers wrote.

Current cancer rates are about two per thousand in the United States each year and a little more than half that in Europe.

A second report in Nature found that the ozone hole over Antarctica would start to "heal" by the early part of the next century, provided agreements are honoured.

David Hoffman of the U.S. Weather Service NOAA said the first signs would be seen by 2008. "The ozone layer would then continue to heal slowly, reaching pre-ozone hole levels by about the year 2050," he wrote.

Future gains seen in war on cancer

By Joanne Kenen

Reuter

WASHINGTON — Buoyed by a small but historic drop in cancer death rates, top experts have predicted that practical prevention efforts combined with cutting-edge scientific advances will lead to more gains.

National Cancer Institute and American Cancer Society experts this week released studies showing a steady decline in cancer deaths every year from 1990 to 1995, the first time such a trend has emerged since public health officials began gathering cancer statistics in the 1930s. "Perhaps this is the beginning of a victory lap," said Health and Human Services Secretary Donna Shalala.

American Cancer Society experts told at a news conference it was quite realistic to forecast that death rates would drop by a fourth within 20 years and it may even be possible to cut the cancer fatality rate in half.

U.S. cancer officials did not make such specific forecasts but they said a combination of better prevention and detection and new treatments should yield more and more gains.

Asked what was most exciting about the next stage of the war on cancer, National Cancer Institute Director Dr. Richard Klausner told Reuters: "Everything" the biggest cloud on the horizon is teen smoking. Nearly one-third of cancer cases are tobacco-related and an increase in teen smoking could wipe out many of the gains.

No one is suggesting that science is on the brink of conquering cancer. More than a half-million Americans and millions more around the globe still die of the disease every year. But scientists in the last few years have finally begun to understand the processes that cause it. Some of the remarkable molecular and genetic discoveries of recent years should start finding their way into the clinic. There will not be a "magic bullet" cure but doctors should soon have better diagnostic tools including relatively simple ones like a urine test for bladder or kidney cancer as well as improved life-prolonging therapies.

And by using the tools already in hand — but using them better — more gains can be made, Dr. James Marks of the Centre for Disease Control and Promotion told Reuters.

UAE pushes for Gulf Arab normalisation with Baghdad

ABU DHABI (R) — The United Arab Emirates (UAE), which has made the strongest push for Arab reconciliation with Iraq, is urging regional allies to normalise ties with Baghdad, a UAE official said on Wednesday.

But differences appear to have sharpened between the UAE and Kuwait which has rejected such calls.

"His Highness (UAE President Sheikh Zayed Bin Sultan Al Nahayan) is encouraging other Gulf Arab states to normalise relations with Iraq," the official told Reuters.

"He said we (Arabs) have to all do it together," he added.

A UAE official familiar with UAE thinking said there had been no contacts between the UAE and Iraq, aside from humanitarian aid to the Iraqi people.

"His Highness said that we are Arabs and we have to forget what happened. We have to renegotiate with Iraq and strengthen our ties once again on a strong basis based on goodwill. We can't keep going on like this," said the official.

But Kuwait, still bitter over Iraq's lightning invasion in 1990 which shocked militarily vulnerable Gulf Arab states, is maintaining a tough line on Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Kuwait on Tuesday said it had turned down a call by Sheikh Zayed during a recent meeting in Abu Dhabi with Kuwait's Crown Prince and prime minister, Sheikh Saad Al Abdullah Al-Sabah, to reconcile with Iraq.

Sheikh Saad told

Kuwait's parliament that "reconciliation does not apply to a country like Iraq" and the "Iraqi regime cannot be trusted."

Sheikh Zayed, the Gulf's elder statesman, has repeatedly called for a new chapter in relations with Iraq, which in 1990 threatened to retaliate against Kuwait and the UAE for flooding world markets with oil just before its troops invaded Kuwait.

The UAE leader, an influential regional player respected for his mediation efforts, has urged reconciliation to ease the suffering of the Iraqi people who have lived under crippling United Nations sanctions for six years.

Sheikh Zayed's call is a bonus for Iraq which has gone from a global oil power to an international pariah hit by everything from humanitarian crises to American air strikes.

Baghdad on Monday accepted U.N. terms to implement a deal signed in May allowing it to sell oil worth $2 billion over six months to pay for food and medicine. It will mark the first time Iraqi oil has been available on world markets since sanctions were imposed after the invasion.

The UAE and its partners in the Gulf Cooperation Council Qatar and Oman have softened their line on Iraq since the invasion, but Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, the region's dominant political and economic power, have maintained a tough stand.

The UAE, aside from its humanitarian concerns, is fearful that a weak Iraq will play into the hands of the Gulf's non-Arab heavy-weight power Iran, just across the waterway.

UAE Foreign Minister Rashid Abdullah Al Nuaimi on Saturday said "Iraq's inability to exercise self-defence has created a strategic and military imbalance in the region," underscoring Baghdad's traditional position as a counterweight to Tehran.

He added that Iran had deployed offensive weapons at three Gulf islands disputed by Abu Dhabi and Tehran.

The official UAE mood was highlighted in newspaper comments which drew a sharp distinction between the Iraqi president and his people.

In a front-page editorial on Wednesday, Al Khaleej said: "Iraq is not Saddam Hussein. And the Iraqi people are not the ruling party and the brutal security apparatus."

Newspapers also launched an unusual attack on Rolf Ekeus, the U.N. official in charge of destroying Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, accusing him of serving "masters" in Washington.

Mr. Ekeus arrived in Abu Dhabi on Wednesday as part of a Gulf tour to seek financial support for his mission.

"The general feeling is that sanctions are not weakening Saddam Hussein. As the U.S. says he is building palaces and strengthening his grip over Iraqis and the people are the ones who are suffering," said the Gulf official.

Germany to take back waste sent to Beirut

BEIRUT (AFP) — Preliminary tests carried out by German experts Wednesday on German waste containers dumped in Beirut since August showed that they contain toxic materials which necessitate their return to Germany.

"Preliminary examinations of this waste proved the presence of materials banned in Lebanon and I think these 36 containers will be shipped back to Germany to be treated," said Wolfgang Lerke, the first secretary at the German embassy in Beirut.

The German experts, along with Lebanese experts and a representative from the international environment group Greenpeace, examined and took samples from 22 out of the 36 containers at the Beirut port.

north in August.

But on Monday, Iraq accepted the remaining U.N. conditions blocking implementation of the oil-for-food plan. The United States and other major powers said the way was now open for Mr. Ghali to give the go-ahead to the plan as soon as final steps have been taken.

Approval of the oil pricing formula was automatic after none of the 15 members of the Security Council Sanctions Committee on Iraq raised objections by 1 p.m. New York time.

Earlier, U.S. officials said they would not object. The United States was seen as the last possible obstacle to approval of the committee.

The 50-page interim report, submitted to the council by U.N. Undersecretary-General Chinmaya Gharekhan, said about two-thirds of the revenues from the sales, or about $1.32 billion, will pay for humanitarian supplies for Iraqi civilians.

Of that, $260 million will go to Iraqis living in Kurdish areas of the north. About 30 per cent of the revenues will compensate victims of the Gulf war and the rest for administrative costs and the U.N. programme to monitor Iraq's weapons programmes.

"The distribution plan confirms the willingness of the government of Iraq to cooperate fully ... (allowing) unrestricted freedom of movement and access to United Nations personnel," the report said.

In London, a Foreign and Commonwealth Office spokesman said the British government was "pleased that Iraq has finally agreed to the implementation of Security Council Resolution 986, as we have long urged."

The delay has caused much unnecessary suffering to the Iraqi people," the spokesman said. "Implementation will bring them some relief, but they will sadly not enjoy a normal life until Iraq fulfills its obligations under the relevant U.N. Security Council resolutions. Sanctions will remain until Iraq does so. It is hard to imagine this happening while Saddam remains in power."

Iraq and the United Nations broke the deadlock in their talks to implement the oil-for-food deal by reaching a compromise in which Iraq won demands over setting prices. Western diplomats said in Baghdad.

"It's because of a mutual compromise that Iraq ended up accepting the deal," which has run into obstacles since it was signed May 20, a Western diplomat said.

"By accepting the accord, the Iraqis were assured that the United States will approve the mechanism for setting prices," another diplomat said, adding that Washington had immediately described Iraq's move as "good news."

Unlike several months ago, Iraq no longer insists on taking part in naming international observers who would supervise the distribution of supplies nor on reducing their number, which the United Nations has set at 159.

"We want cooperation with the U.N.," an Iraqi official said on condition he not be named.

"The Americans for their part showed flexibility, especially after the development in northern Iraq where they suffered a defeat, as evidenced by the withdrawal of their agents from this region," he added.

The United States decided to evacuate from Iraqi Kurdistan more than 5,000 relief workers after pulling out some 3,000 others earlier for fear their lives might be in danger in the region. Iraqi agents infiltrated the north after President Saddam Hussein's troops helped the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) capture the main city of Erbil from a rival faction on Aug. 31.

the military prosecution.

Judge Faouri, however, ruled that it was "permissible to rely on the suspect's testimonies even if they were detained by security forces for a long period."

The five other defendants who were indicted and sentenced of slandering King Hussein were: Nassre Izzedin Tahayneh, 24, (three years), Nabil Yousef Abu Harthieh, 28, (30 months), Sharif Ibrahim Jumah, 37, (two years), Ahmad Abdullah Zeitawi, 25, (two years), and Mohammad Abdul Karim Rawashdeh, 23, (two years).

The three defendants who walked free were Mohammad Wasfi Abu Khalil, 33, Mohammad Fakhr Saleh, 28, and Alaedn Atef Abdul Jawad, 24.

According to court transcripts, one of them received military training in Pakistan in 1989, and after living in Kuwait for three years, he smuggled hand grenades and mines in 1992 into Jordan and hid them in his house in Yajouz area.

The defendants were expelled from court several times for disrupting procedures during the 14-month trial.

The group was arrested before actually carrying out any attack.

Bayat Al Imam followers believe only themselves to be the "true followers" of the Islamic faith and do not attend mosque prayers or schools because they reject the entire system.

The defendants also refused to stand trial at first because they said they did not believe in the court's justice system.

They had said they will defend themselves, or "God would decide their fate."

The sentences will be reviewed by the Court of Cassation within 30 days.

General Assembly to stress need to develop information in Palestine

NEW YORK (UNIS) — The General Assembly would note that several defined provisions of the Department of Public Information (DPI) special information programme on the question of Palestine were yet to be implemented and would stress the importance of such implementation, under the terms of one of four draft resolutions approved Tuesday by the Committee for the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People.

The assembly would request DPI, among other things, to organise fact-finding news missions for journalists to the area, including the territories under the administration of Palestine and the occupied territories, and to provide media development assistance to the Palestinian people, including training of broadcasters and journalists.

Following approval of the text, the permanent observer for Palestine said that implementation of the DPI special information programme would be extremely difficult because of a new paragraph contained in a Fourth Committee (Special and Decolonisation) draft resolution. That paragraph requests that DPI be provided with an identification of all costs arising from information mandates contained in resolutions other than those recommended by the Committee on Information. The paragraph should be reconsidered and its harmful impact neutralised. The political will of the international community and the assembly should not be circumvented by such technicalities, he added.

By the terms of another draft approved Tuesday, focusing on the Division for Palestinian Rights of the secretariat, the assembly would request the secretary-general to provide the division with the necessary resources of the United Nations Information System on the Question of Palestine.

The final draft text approved Tuesday, on the peaceful settlement of the question of Palestine, would have the assembly note with satisfaction the withdrawal of the Israeli army in the Gaza Strip and the Jericho area, initiation of the Palestinian National Authority in those areas, and the beginning of the redeployment of the Israeli army in the rest of the West Bank. It would express concern over the difficulties facing the Middle East peace process, and the deterioration of the socio-economic conditions of the Palestinian people as a result of Israeli positions and measures.

Corporation which was registered as a commercial entity two months ago.

The company remains fully government-owned but it now operates as an independent commercial organisation governed by the Companies Law as opposed to its previous status as a semi-autonomous government institution.

The National Telecommunications Company has invited bids for a "strategic partner" so that it could expand and modernise its facilities as well as absorb up-to-date technology to keep up with advances in the area of telecommunications without investing state funds.

The decision to withdraw the official telephone lines was taken "in view of the reality that the strategic partner is not likely to accept that the company continues to extend free services to the government," said an official source.

It was not immediately clear whether the decision to withdraw the lines also covered ministries and government departments.

Conservative estimates put at several million dinars the annual telephone bills incurred by government employees using their official telephone lines connected at their residences.

Experts said the Telecommunications Corporation used to maintain a record of the bills although they were never formally presented to the government for payment. As such, the figures were never announced in public.

The government also permits members of the Cabinet and senior government officials to have mobile phones, but this arrangement is not expected to be affected because it has been made directly between the government and the private sector company which offers cellular phone services.

Another source said government servants who might lose their telephone lines as a result of the decision could apply directly to the National Telecommunications Company to retain the lines but they would be treated as any other customer of the company with all that it entails.

Iraqi traders prefer routing imports through Gulf ports

BAGHDAD (R) — Iraq is diverting its trade with the outside world to its ports on the Gulf and imports from the United Arab Emirates (UAE) are rising in volume, Baghdad traders said Wednesday.

They said Iraq's southern ports were bristling with life again with scores of small and medium-sized ships anchoring every day. The new outlet, the traders said, gave them access to duty-free UAE goods which "are of a better quality and cheaper than those we used to get from Jordan".

"We no longer have to deal with a chain of checkpoints on the highway to Jordan. It is always safer to travel the sea," said one trader.

Another said U.S. and Allied warships in the Gulf would search suspected ships and boats but would set them free if carrying documents from the U.N.'s Iraq sanctions committee and if the goods were of a humanitarian nature.

Baghdad traders expected a big boost in Iraqi imports via the Gulf once humanitarian supplies under Iraq's oil-for-food deal with U.N. start pouring in.

Traffic on the 1,000-kilometre highway to Jordan has been reduced to a trickle, travellers said. "You now have fewer trucks on the road than any time before. The highway is now mainly used by tankers and passenger cars," said a traveller.

Traders said Iraq's imports of flour, rice and cooking oils from India, Malaysia and Vietnam were now shipped through the Gulf instead of the Jordanian port of Aqaba.

"It is easier to deal with the UAE. The authorities have recently relaxed visa restrictions for Iraqi traders and UAE merchants are very cooperative," said another trader.

He said Jordan still remained a financial centre for Iraqi traders but the Gulf route was more profitable for business with South East Asia and goods in the UAE were cheaper to buy and ship to Iraq.

Jordan slashed the volume of a $400 million protocol trade with Iraq in 1995 by about half as part of efforts to tighten the noose on the government in Baghdad. Jordan receives around 700,000 barrels of low-priced Iraqi oil per day.

Iraqi newspapers on Wednesday said a big delegation of Jordanian industrialists and exporters was due in Baghdad in an effort to persuade the authorities to increase the volume of bilateral trade.

Iraqi ports, damaged in the 1980-88 Gulf war with Iran and the 1991 Gulf war over Kuwait, can now only handle cargo ships of up to 30,000 tonnes. Large shipments, traders said, still need to be diverted to Jordan or Turkey.

Diplomats said Iraq sought routes to the UAE and the Gulf for its trade when political ties with Amman worsened following Jordan's decision last year to shelter Baghdad's dissidents.

Pakistan cuts jobs to save money

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — Pakistan's interim government has fired 40,000 civil servants, all hired by former prime minister Benazir Bhutto, news reports and officials have said.

The sacked employees were among 200,000 people hired during Ms. Bhutto's three years in power.

In a move to cut government expenses by a whopping 10 billion rupees ($250 million), the interim administration is firing employees, merging ministries, selling off government vehicles and eliminating 2,505 positions, said Information Minister Ershad Haqqani.

As well 491 telephones have been disconnected, which should save the government nearly $1 million, he said.

When the president dismissed Ms. Bhutto's government last Nov. 5, he accused her of overstaffing the government and public corporations with friends and family.

In the last year, the national airline alone hired an additional 1,000 people — all sent to them by the government — despite the fact that it had been operating at a loss.

Mr. Haqqani said the cutbacks will not result in any reduction in service. It wasn't clear which ministries would be hardest hit, but it appeared there would be cutbacks in all 31 government departments.

The Pakistani government is the largest single employer in a country of 140 million people.

In one province, which he refused to name, every minister had 30 different luxury vehicles at his disposal.

"I'm horrified to know all about this, but it is true," he said.

Ms. Bhutto has denied the accusations against her.

Her husband, Asif Ali Zardari, who has been jailed since the government was dismissed, has been at the centre of most corruption scandals.

An intelligence report acquired by the Associated Press accuses Mr. Zardari of overstaffing government departments with his personal appointments "in violation of all rules".

"A large number of middle level officers were inducted or brought on line through horizontal transfers, illegal elevations and inductions," said the intelligence report.

The report runs through each government department identifying areas where favouritism was shown in the awarding of contracts and tenders as well as jobs given to friends and relatives.

Islamic banks flourish but hurdles seen ahead

DUBAI (R) — Islamic banks have become more popular among the world's one billion Muslims, but the more than 185 financial institutions which strictly adhere to the principles of Islamic Sharia law face hurdles to lure more funds, bankers have said.

The banks are increasingly facing competition from Western banks offering Islamic products. They need to educate more Muslims about their services, standardize their products and develop a sound legal framework in which to operate, Islamic bankers at a conference in Dubai said.

"The growth rate of Islamic banks during the past 20 years has been quite remarkable, if not phenomenal," said International Association of Islamic Banks Secretary-General Samir Abid Shaikh. "But it is now tapering off at five to seven per cent."

He said Islamic financial institutions' assets had jumped 21 times in 10 years to around $166 billion in 1995.

Islamic banks do not deal in interest — the core of the Western banking system — as it is regarded by many Muslims as usury.

Ministry finalises plan for road projects valued at JD235.7m

THE MINISTRY of Public Works and Housing has finalised a new plan to implement a number of road projects valued at JD235.7 million over the coming five years.

Mr. Abdul Majeed Al Kabarti, the secretary-general's assistant for road affairs, said that a 120-kilometre, four-lane highway linking North Shouneh with South Shouneh is expected for completion within three years at a cost of JD75 million.

The ministry will implement the Qataneh-Karak highway, which will be a four-lane, 33-kilometre road, at a cost of JD26 million. Another project will be a four-lane, 18-kilometre long coastal road in Aqaba at a cost of JD21 million.

Mr. Kabarti said Amman would benefit from a 50-kilometre belt road that will be four lanes and will cost about JD21 million.

Other projects include:

- 1) A 20-kilometre, four-lane belt road in Irbid at a cost of JD17.7 million.
- 2) The third stage of the Irbid-North Shouneh road. This stage will be in four lanes and will extend for 12 kilometres at a cost of JD12 million.

- 3) A two-lane road that will extend 26 kilometres between Karak and Al Ghor at a cost of JD14 million.
- 4) A four-lane, 14-kilometre highway that will link the city of Aqaba with the main road at a cost of JD10.5 million.

- 5) A road between the border posts in the area of Ummar and King Abdullah bridge at a cost of JD10 million.
- 6) The second stage of the Naour-South Shouneh road valued at JD5 million.

- 7) A four-lane, 12-kilometre highway between Naour and Um Al Basateen estimated to cost JD6 million.
- 8) A four-lane, 19-kilometre highway between Yajouz and Zarqa at a cost of about JD10 million.

- 9) A road between the Prince Mohammad bridge and the facilities surrounding it at a cost of around JD7.5 million.

Mr. Kabarti said that there are other road projects to be implemented in the Jordan valley with the financial assistance of Japan (Al Ra'i).

Egypt launches uranium project

CAIRO (AFP) — Egypt has launched the first stage of a project to produce uranium for scientific, medical and agricultural use, Energy Minister Maher Abaza said in statements published Tuesday.

Mr. Abaza said the scheme stipulated the production of uranium "as a by-product of phosphoric acid to meet the fuel requirements needed by specialised atomic research centres for their operations," according to Al Ahram government daily.

In addition, it would be used to produce radioactive isotopes used particularly in the fields of medicine, sciences, industry, agriculture and food preservation, Mr. Abaza said.

Mr. Abaza estimated at six million pounds (about $2 million) the cost of the first stage of the project, which is expected to produce one tonne of uranium every year.

The project is being run by the Egyptian Nuclear Materials Authority which hopes to expand it to meet the future requirements of peaceful nuclear industries, Mr. Abaza said.

The authority has meanwhile carried out technical and feasibility studies that showed the existence of minerals such as uranium ore and zircon in the sands of the northeastern coast.

Williams may be indicted for Senna's death

ROME (R) — An Italian prosecutor has obtained leave to indict Formula One team manager Frank Williams and five other people for alleged manslaughter over the death in 1994 of Ayrton Senna, the Italian news agency ANSA reported Tuesday.

Its despatch from the central city of Bologna, which could not be confirmed, said Williams technical manager Patrick Head and Belgian race director Roland Byrnes also faced trial over Senna's death at the San Marino Grand Prix at Imola.

The others were Imola race track directors Federico Bordinelli and Giorgio Poggi and an unnamed Williams mechanic whom investigators allege carried out modifications to the steering column of Senna's car, the agency reports.

Brazilian Senna, three times world champion, suffered fatal head injuries when his Williams car smashed into a wall on Imola's Tamborello Curve during the race on May 1, 1994.

An expert report for Bologna investigators concluded the car's steering column had been modified and snapped as the car took the curve as a result of a poor weld.

The Williams team has argued that the steering column was intact until the moment of impact.

ANSA's unsourced report said public prosecutor Maurizio Passarini had obtained leave from an examining judge, Diego Di Marco, to proceed with an indictment.

"Passarini... will draw up the indictment in the next few days. Then a date has to be fixed for the trial, which will take place before the local judge in Imola," the report said.

A manslaughter charge carries a maximum prison sentence of seven years in the event of conviction.

Di Marco and Williams's Italian lawyer were unavailable for comment. Passarini's office, contacted by telephone, would neither confirm nor deny the report.

"Mr Passarini has nothing to say on the matter," an official at the prosecutor's office said. "We have a duty not to comment."

ANSA said Di Marco had accepted recommendations by Passarini to drop proceedings against several other people investigated in his enquiry, a move that legally opened the way for the prosecutor to proceed with his indictment.

Senna died a day after Austrian Roland Ratzenberger, who drove for the Simtek team, was killed on the same Imola track in a 300 kph smash during final practice.

ANSA said Di Marco had accepted a recommendation from Passarini to drop proceedings against five people investigated in connection with Ratzenberger's death.

Bevilacqua to carry on despite IAAF action

ROME (R) — Italian high jumper Antonella Bevilacqua said on Tuesday she would carry on despite a decision by the International Amateur Athletic Federation (IAAF) to uphold a ban for doping.

"I want to continue because athletics is a beautiful sport and I enjoy being a part of it," she said. Bevilacqua tested positive twice in May for the stimulant Ephedrine but an Italian federation (FIDAL) panel ruled she had taken the drug by accident and did not impose the statutory three-month ban which would have prevented her taking part in the Atlanta Olympic where she finished fourth.

IAAF spokesman Giorgio Reineri said on Tuesday the panel had decided the FIDAL decision was wrong and Bevilacqua should have been suspended for three months from May 26. "FIDAL misdirected itself by applying in this case the IOC (International Olympic Committee) medical code instead of the IAAF rules and procedural guidelines for doping control," Reineri said in a telephone interview.

"Miss Bevilacqua had under the IAAF rules the liability for the doping offence which has been shown to have taken place," Bevilacqua said she was surprised because she had expected to be cleared and hinted that she would take legal action, saying that she intended to keep her silence on the case to "allow the lawyers to speak" in her place. The ban covered the period from May 26 to August 25 and Bevilacqua is free to compete again now.

"In Athens I will go above two metres," she said, referring to the next world championships in Greece.

FIDAL said in a statement it was surprised and "deeply disappointed" by the IAAF decision. "FIDAL underlines with great surprise the fact that the commission appears not to have taken into account the official documentation which showed an obligation, on the part of all involved, to respect Article 5 of the IOC medical code," the statement said.

The Italian federation said that, aside from matters of principle and law, the "fundamental aspect of this case is the defence of the athlete, of her rights and performances."

It said that FIDAL reserved the right to take whatever measures necessary to look after the athlete and her reputation while awaiting further developments.

An Italian athletics source said earlier that the IAAF wanted to scrub Bevilacqua's result from the 1996 Olympics and added that FIDAL was likely to appeal to the IOC to prevent that from happening.

Although Bevilacqua missed a medal in Atlanta, the fourth place was her best ever result in a major competition and Italian officials have suggested that being stripped of the recognition could harm the athlete psychologically.

Olajuwon comes back with 27 points against Portland

Spurs, Suns lose again

HOUSTON (R) — Hakeem Olajuwon scored 27 points after missing three games with an irregular heartbeat, and Clyde Drexler's three-point play with 39 seconds left in overtime broke a tie to lead the Houston Rockets to a 102-101 victory over the Portland Trail Blazers Tuesday.

Houston has won seven straight games and improved to 7-1 at home. The Rockets are 13-1 and are tied with the Chicago Bulls for the NBA's best record.

Olajuwon made 9-of-21 shots from the field and played 41 minutes. He helped Houston outscore the Blazers, 46-28, in the paint.

"Everything is fine. I was not fatigued, just a little sluggish to start," said Olajuwon.

In Toronto, Mahmoud Abdul-Rauf and Corliss Williamson combined for 21 points in the first quarter as the Sacramento Kings opened an 11-point lead and held on for a 98-87 victory over the Toronto Raptors, who lost their sixth straight game.

Abdul-Rauf scored 11 of his 18 points and Williamson added 10 of his 12 in the opening period, when Sacramento opened a 31-20 lead.

Raptors' starting rookie Marcus Camby collapsed in pre-game warmups and was taken to a hospital with, but he is expected to make a full recovery.

"I had back spasms and I'll be out at least a week," Camby said.

In Atlanta, Christian Laettner scored 18 points to lead five players in double figures and Dikembe Mutombo had 14 as the Atlanta Hawks coasted to a 101-80 victory over the Vancouver Grizzlies.

Tyrone Corbin scored 17 points, Mookie Blaylock

15 and Eldridge Recasner 10 for Atlanta, which outscored Vancouver 37-19 in the first quarter and never looked back.

Shareef Abdur-Rahim scored 19 points, including 9-of-9 from the foul line for Vancouver.

In Charlotte, Anthony Mason had his first career triple-double, and Muggsy Bogues scored six of his 10 points in a third-quarter run as the Charlotte Hornets snapped the 11-game winning streak of the Seattle Supersonics, 97-89.

Mason finished with 14 points, 10 rebounds and 10 assists for Charlotte. Vlade Divac had 13 points and 13 rebounds for the Hornets.

In Dallas, Chris Gatling scored 10 of his 26 points in the fourth quarter as the Dallas Mavericks dealt the San Antonio Spurs their sixth straight loss, 105-101.

George McCloud scored 22 points and Jim Jackson had 21 for the Mavericks, who led by as many as nine points in the final period and snapped a two-game losing streak.

Dominique Wilkins scored 32 points for the Spurs.

In Denver, Dick Motta won his first game back as a coach, as Dale Ellis scored 28 points, and Brooks Thompson added a career-high 26 for the Denver Nuggets, who knocked off the winless Phoenix Suns, 117-108.

Thompson, a second-year guard, signed last week after being released by the Utah Jazz, nailed 11 three-pointers. Tom Hammond added 19 points for Denver.

In Philadelphia, Shaquille O'Neal had 23 points and 20 rebounds and led a decisive fourth-quarter surge as the Los Angeles Lakers turned in a 100-88 victory over the Philadelphia 76ers.

Eddie Jones added 23 points for the Lakers, who overcame a 10-point halftime deficit and improved to 5-3 on the road.

"I thought we played an outstanding second half," Lakers coach Del Harris said. "I was worried at halftime. Philadelphia took a lot of momentum into their locker room."

At Golden State, Dan Majerle scored 23 points and Keith Askins keyed a decisive second-quarter run as the Miami Heat won their fifth straight game, defeating the Golden State Warriors 107-88.

Alonzo Mourning scored 22 points and Tim Hardaway added 17 for Miami.

Joe Smith scored 24 points, Chris Mullin 17 and Mark Price had 12 for Golden State.

Sydney moves ahead with Olympic preparations

SYDNEY (AFP) — Sydney's preparations to host the 2000 Olympics are moving up a gear, Olympics minister Michael Knight said Wednesday, following suggestions that the works are behind schedule.

"Now is the time for us to apply more of our energy, more of our effort, at getting the organisational plans for the conduct of the Games, the putting on of the event," Knight told parliament.

The minister, who is also president of the Sydney Organising Committee for the Olympic Games (SOCOG) was responding to suggestions in the Sydney Morning Herald newspaper that preparations were well behind schedule.

Knight told parliament that while the new South Wales state government and the International Olympic Committee (IOC) were more than pleased with progress on the Sydney Games, it was now time to pick up the pace.

The Sydney Morning Herald said Knight had been given the go-ahead to

Athens uses Internet to boost 2004 Games bid

ATHENS (AP) — Athens has moved its effort to host the 2004 Olympic Games to the Internet's World Wide Web.

"We wanted to provide people with direct information on our bid as well as information on how other cities are doing," Manolis Mavromatis, press director for the organizing committee, said on Tuesday.

The web site provides a summary of the bid file for the 2004 games, plus briefs on the history of the Olympic games — from their roots in ancient Greece to their revival here 100 years ago — the city of recruit about 10 senior executives for socog positions that have remained vacant more than three years since Sydney won the bid.

Knight said outstanding senior positions would be filled by the end of March next year, but declined to give further details.

After a string of resignations and board reshuffles, the newspaper also raised questions about the future SOCOG chief executive Mal Hemmerling, who it said would not be involved in the selection of the executives.

However, Knight said Hemmerling had the board's full backing.

At the same time, information on facilities and infrastructure works in progress, Mavromatis said the site is one of five already put on the web by contending cities. Others include Buenos Aires, Istanbul, Lille, Seville, and Stockholm.

A total of 11 cities are bidding for the 2004 games. The others are Cape Town, Rio De Janeiro, San Juan, and St. Petersburg.

They will be pared down to four or five in March and the final decision will be announced in Los Angeles on Sept. 5.

Librarian striker George Weah of AC Milan last year became the first non-European to win the trophy after the rules were changed to extend the award to the best footballer playing in Europe, regardless of nationality.

Weah is among 20 players remaining from the first list of 50 chosen last year.

Euro '96 had a strong impact, with 35 on the list having taken part in the European championship finals in England last June.

Germany have the highest number of nominees (8), followed by France (7). Italy have dropped from eight last year to five this year, although 18 of the 50 play in Italy. The Czech Republic, beaten by Germany in the European championship final, provide four players on the list compared with none last year.

Among the big names to disappear are Weah's predecessors Roberto Baggio of Italy and Hristo Stoichkov of Bulgaria.

Flemish cyclist arrives in Jordan as part of world tour

By Tanya Hahjouqa
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — A man, a vision, and a bicycle — how many great tales began this way?

Michel De Vos, a Flemish cyclist who has embarked on a world tour to seek culture and cycle some 100,000 kilometres over a four-year period is now cycling through Jordan. De Vos told the Jordan Times Wednesday that he was not seeking fame nor the attention of the Guinness Book of World Records, but was on a personal journey for education of all the cultures of the world, and hopes to help developing countries inadvertently through his writings.

The idea came to him 10 years ago in Belgium, and it has taken almost a decade to animate his vision.

"I did not seek a sponsor. I wanted the freedom to travel as I pleased," he said.

After gathering enough money and a custom made bicycle built especially for his measurements, his first attempt almost put an end to his dream when he hit the road during July of 1995 and was nearly stoned to death while cycling through Iran.

"Everything was progressing nicely, and I found the Iranians to be extremely friendly. But while I was cycling in the south of Iran men jumped out of a truck, beat me, threw stones at my face, and stole my bags," he said, adding that he would return to Iran to show that he held no grudge because of "a few cruel thieves."

After hospitalisation and a search for his bicycle by the Iranian authorities, De Vos finally began his journey again in 1996 on June 3rd and mounted his bag-laden bike to travel through the Baltics, the Ukraine, Eastern Europe, Greece, and has now made his way down to the Middle East.

While in Syria, he experienced his first problem obtaining a visa from the Saudi Arabian embassy, which delayed his journey at least nine days.

"When I travel I like to experience all aspects of the culture, and I stay with a range of people from farmers to diplomats, who have all been very kind," he said.

De Vos plans on travelling to Egypt today, and then on to Yemen, Oman, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Kuwait, Iran, and Pakistan on his way to the Far East.

"I always knew that I wanted to travel the five continents to learn about the different cultures and religions, and I never let anything distract me, not even marriage," he said.

Preparation for the journey included the study of languages, of which De Vos is fluent in Flemish, English, French, Spanish, and German.

He also taught sports for eight years, as well as worked with the Belgian Olympic Committee, the Belgian Sailing Federation, and the Flemish Sports Administration.

According to De Vos, when he completes his journey he will write a book, and will donate the proceeds to whatever country he finds to be the most needy.

Following this interview, De Vos then hopped his lanky form on his bicycle, and was off in a rush to accept a dinner invitation from a Jordanian family.

Kolyvanov sets seal on Bologna victory

BOLOGNA (R) — Russian striker Igor Kolyvanov gave Bologna a 2-1 victory with a second half penalty on Tuesday as the home team saw off Second Division Cremonese 5-2 on aggregate to reach the Italian Cup semifinals.

The outcome of the match had always looked a foregone conclusion and only 3,500 spectators, including Italy coach Arrigo Sacchi, turned up on a bitterly cold night at Bologna's Renato Dall'Ara Stadium.

The sense of inevitability was reinforced almost immediately, when Giorgio Bresciani slotted home Bologna's first goal in the second minute.

Bresciani pounced on the rebound after goalkeeper Domenico Dardo parried a shot from Russian Igor Shalimov.

Cremonese equalised with a 26th minute penalty following a foul on the edge of the area on midfielder Riccardo Maspero, who easily converted the spot kick.

Kolyvanov then made it 2-1 on the night with a 76th minute penalty after Sweden's Kennet Andersson was brought down by a tackle from behind as he headed for goal.

Bologna, who play newly crowned World Club champions Juventus away in the league on Sunday, now play either Milan or the current league leaders Vicenza in the semifinal, played over two legs on January 29 and February 26.

Labour peace in baseball as owners ratify deal

CHICAGO (AP) — Baseball owners ended a bitter four-year fight with their players Tuesday, ratifying a new collective bargaining agreement that ensures play will continue without interruption.

The owners approved a deal that ushers in a new era in the game, allowing for play between the American and National Leagues and revenue sharing to help financially struggling teams.

Many teams wanted a stronger restraint on salaries, with some advocating a salary cap. But many teams had tired of the fight and realised that it would take another costly work stoppage to gain additional concessions.

"Baseball fans can finally look forward to five years of uninterrupted play," acting commissioner Bud Selig said. "We can now work together to bring peace to the game. This very difficult and painful process is now behind us."

Final approval from players could come next week, when the union's executive board meets at Dorado Beach, Puerto Rico.

The same proposal was voted down three weeks ago. But Philadelphia Phillies owner Bill Giles said that since then the clubs developed "the realisation that we couldn't change the deal."

Union head Donald Fehr and management negotiator Randy Levine must now draft a formal agreement to cover the outline they agreed to Oct. 24. Owners gave their 10-man executive council authority to approve the final draft without convening another owners' meeting.

When they voted in early November, owners demanded that the union make two major changes: eliminating the players' option to extend the agreement through the 2001 season and eliminating the provision restricting a luxury tax to a maximum of five teams per season. Fehr rejected making any major changes, leaving the owners essentially with a take-it-or-leave-it decision.

Under the proposal, up to five teams would pay a 35 percent tax on the amount of their payrolls over $51 million next season and $55 million in 1998. In 1999, they would pay a 34 percent tax on the amount over $58.9 million, and in 2000 the tax would disappear.

The most revolutionary aspect would be the start of interleague play for the first time since professional major leagues formed in 1871. It would begin June 12, when the four NL West teams would play the four AL West teams, with the other divisions starting the next day.

Owners reopened the old contract on Dec. 7, 1992, but took until June 14, 1994 to present their salary cap plan. Players struck that Aug. 12 and the walkout lasted 232 days, wiping out the world series for the first time in 90 years.

The strike, baseball's eighth work stoppage since 1972, ended on March 31, 1995, when a U.S. District judge issued an injunction restoring the expired agreement, ruling owners illegally changed rules regarding free agency and salary arbitration.

Even President Clinton failed to resolve the dispute, expressing exasperation in February 1995, after he called both sides into the White House without being able to forge an agreement.

Fans responded with anger, cutting the average attendance from 31,612 per game in 1994 to 25,260 in 1995. It rebounded to 26,889 per cent last season to 26,889.

Wimbledon No. 1 court dug up

LONDON (R) — Work began Tuesday on digging up the turf of Wimbledon's No. 1 court in preparation for the demolition of the arena to make way for a new 11,500-capacity stadium.

But although the arena has reached the end of its life after 72 years, the grass will continue to play host to top-class tennis.

On Thursday it is due to be bundled up and taken by lorry to Eastbourne, where it will be laid on Devonshire Park international tennis centre's number one court.

A Wimbledon spokesman said: "We wanted the turf to remain in Britain and if it had been sold at auction, then it could have gone to a private bidder from abroad."

Christopher Gorrage, the All England Lawn Tennis Club's chief executive, added: "We are naturally pleased that this favourite surface will continue to make a lasting contribution to tennis in this country."

The 100,000 pounds ($165,000) cost of buying and moving the turf, as well as the purchase of some seats and memorabilia from the court, is being met by the Lawn Tennis Association, an insurance company and the Eastbourne local council.

House elects panels after lengthy debate over composition

By Sa'eda Kilani
Special To The Jordan Times

AMMAN — After extensive consultations between the government and the Lower House of Parliament on Wednesday, deputies agreed, without the customary acrimonious debate, on the final make-up of the House's 14 various committees.

At the beginning of the session, deputies seemed determined not to withdraw from three main committees: judiciary, finance and public freedoms. The number of deputies in each committee exceeded 20 while the House bylaws allow for 11 members only. After the one-hour break, Speaker Sa'ad Havel Srour announced that the different parliamentary blocs came to an agreement on the final composition of these committees.

At the outset, deputies were mainly competing over three main committees: the Law Committee, the Finance Committee, and the Freedoms Committee.

Leftist Deputy Toujan

Faisal contended that deputies who are also ministers should withdraw from those committees since they will have the right anyway to attend and participate in their proceedings. Centrist Deputy and former Minister Abdul Raouf Rawabdeh also expressed reservation that ministers should be over-represented in the committee.

After the one-hour consultations, a large number of ministers withdrew from the respective committees. Four out of seven withdrew from the Finance Committee, two out of five from the Law Committee and four out of six from the Freedoms Committee. No deputy from the opposition parties withdrew their nomination.

The final composition of all committees is as follows: The administrative committee: Mifteh Lawzi (Amman-centrist), Abdul Min'em Abu Zant (Amman-Islamist), Theib Anis (Zarqa-Islamist), Ibrahim Samara (Ramtha-centrist), Khaled Abdul Nabbi (Amman-centrist).

Suleiman Sa'ad (Jerash-Islamist), Taha Hababeh (Tafleh-centrist), Bader Riati (Aqaba-Islamist), and Jamil Hshoush (Karak-centrist).

The National Guidance Committee: Hammam Sa'ed (Amman-Islamist), Abdul Rahim Ekour (Irbid-Islamist), Mohammad Haj (Zarqa-Islamist), Deifallah Momeni (Ajloun-Islamist), Taha Hababeh (Tafleh-centrist), Theib Abdullah (Amman-centrist), Ibrahim Samara (Ramtha-centrist), Hamzeh Mansour (Amman-Islamist), and Abdul Raouf Rawabdeh (Ramtha-centrist).

The Health and Environment Committee: Mohammad Ziben (Amman-centrist), Aref Bataineh (Irbid-minister), Mohammad Abu Eleim (Mafrqa-centrist), Munir Sobar (Amman-minister), Mustafa Shneikat (Balqa-minister), Hani Hijazin (Karak-centrist), Ahmad Qudah (Ajloun-minister), Abdul Hafez Shakhaneh (Madaba-minister), Nazeeh

Ten given life terms to two years in Bayat Al Imam case

By Rana Hussein
Special to the Jordan Times

AMMAN — The State Security Court on Wednesday sentenced 10 people to jail terms ranging from life imprisonment with hard labour to two years for attempted sabotage and lese majeste.

The military tribunal cleared three men who, the prosecution charged, belonged to the same group known as Bayat Al Imam, from all charges because of lack of evidence.

Seven of the 13 were charged by the prosecution with plotting to carry out extremist attacks and illegal possession and manufacturing of explosives with illicit intent and slander against His Majesty King Hussein.

The remaining six were charged with distributing pamphlets that were slanderous to the King.

The military tribunal declared two men innocent of sabotage and possession of explosives and amended the illicit intent charges to possession of explosives against four of the five defendants. It also cleared two defendants accused of slandering the King.

The four indicted and sentenced to hard labour prison terms were: Issam Mohammad Mohammad, 35, (15 years) Ahmad Fudeil Khaleileh, 28, (15 years), Khalid Mustafa Aroui, 27, (10 years), and Suleiman Taleb Thamrah, 27, (15 years).

The fifth defendant, Mustafa Hussein Musa Suleiman, 22, was convicted of possessing and manufacturing explosives with illicit intent and was first sentenced to death.

But the court decided to commute the death sentence to life imprisonment with hard labour "because he is young and deserves a better chance and because he caused no deaths," Judge Youssef Faouri said in the 39-page verdict.

Upon hearing the verdict, the first defendant, Issam Mohammad, Taher Mohammad, also known as Abu Mohammad Al Maqdesi, the alleged leader of the group, shouted: "If you think your verdict will frighten and dissuade us from continuing our mission, you are mistaken because this will only make us stronger."

In an interview with Al Wasat magazine in August 1996, Maqdesi said he knew the four men who were involved in a November 1995 bombing in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, which killed five Americans and two Indians.

The four men had told interrogators before they were beheaded in March that they were influenced by the philosophies by various Islamic militant leaders, including Maqdesi.

Following Wednesday's verdict, court-appointed attorneys defending the group told the Jordan Times that they were not appealing the sentences because they were satisfied with the ruling.

"We were expecting a tougher punishment. The court's decision was merciful and fair, and we are not appealing the verdict," one of the lawyers said.

The tribunal, which apart from Judge Faouri includes Aref Syouf and Salem Saoudi, said it relied on the defendants' own confessions to prosecutors which "was found similar to the evidence presented by the prosecution in court."

Judge Faouri said that the court also relied on testimonies of explosive experts and police officers.

In their testimonies, defendants claimed they were detained by the security forces for more than six months during which they were subjected to psychological and physical torture before being handed over to

Shahor: Security behind violations of self-rule accords

AMMAN (J.T.) —

The Israeli army's coordinator in the occupied territories, Major-General Oren Shahor, has admitted that Israel had violated some clauses of the Oslo agreement, but said most of the violations stemmed from security considerations, an Israeli newspaper published Wednesday.

In a meeting with the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee, General Shahor presented a list of Israeli violations as presented by the Palestinians, the Jerusalem Post said.

The general said most of them were a question of "different interpretation" of the agreement. Last week the committee discussed the Palestinian violations.

The most obvious — and undisputed — Israeli violations are the failure to carry out the redeployment in Hebron scheduled for last March, and the first of three planned further redeployments in the territories that had been scheduled for September.

According to an official briefing, the list of 34 violations, later distributed to reporters, was based on a report presented by Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erekat in September.

Gen. Shahor rejected many of the claims on security grounds, including the Palestinian charge that they have not been given all the authority they were meant to have in areas in the West Bank and Gaza where Israel has overriding security responsibility.

He similarly rejected a complaint about Israel not having allocated certain routes for the use of the Palestinian police, and that the joint patrols have not been expanded in other areas.

He also dismissed a complaint that Israel had overstepped its bounds at the Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem, saying this stemmed from security needs.

He said some of the Palestinian complaints were unsubstantiated, including a charge that Israel has not granted the Palestinians air space or that Israel has imposed a blockade off the Gaza coast. Gen. Shahor said there was no blockade, although the area in which fishing boats are allowed has been reduced.

There is also a disagreement about the charges of Israeli violations at the as yet non-operational airport in Gaza. The Palestinians are demanding overall responsibility there, while Israel claims that it has the same status as other crossings, with ultimate Israeli responsibility, the Post said.

Israeli minister threatens to annex West Bank and Gaza

TEL AVIV (Agencies) — An Israeli minister warned Wednesday that his country could annex the West Bank and Gaza Strip if Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat seeks recognition for an independent state.

"Such a step on the part of Mr. Arafat would mean an outright annulment of the Oslo (autonomy) accords," Communication Minister Limor Livnat, a member of the ruling Likud bloc, told Israeli radio.

"In this case, I would ask the government to retaliate by taking our own unilateral measures affecting the Palestinians. I would call for the extension of Israeli sovereignty over (West Bank) and Gaza," she said.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu also issued a stern warning to Palestinian leaders on Friday against reported plans by the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) to seek U.N. recognition of Palestinian demands for independence.

"A one-sided announcement by the Palestinian (National) Authority (PNA) on the establishment of a state is a breach of agreements and a serious mistake on its part," Mr. Netanyahu said.

But Mr. Arafat himself said last week that an independent Palestinian state would be declared "in two years, at the end of the interim period."

This was a reference to the 1993 Oslo interim accords on autonomy under which Israel and the Palestinians are due to complete negotiations on a permanent settlement and status for the territories by May 1999.

Mr. Netanyahu has ruled out permitting the creation of a sovereign Palestinian state with full military and diplomatic powers. His right-wing government aims instead to propose a broad form of autonomy.

The PLO symbolically declared an independent state in November 1988. The state has been recognised by more than 100 countries.

France said Wednesday it was very concerned over comments by Mr. Netanyahu pledging to ensure Jewish towns on the West Bank will grow and prosper "forever."

"The encouragement this gives to the development of settlements in the Palestinian territories appears counter to the interim autonomy accord," signed in Washington in September 1995, said the Foreign Ministry.

"Such a policy, if it is confirmed, would risk creating new sources of tension and new blocking factors," said spokesman Jacques Rummelhardt following Mr. Netanyahu's comments Tuesday.

Mr. Netanyahu told Jewish settlers in the West Bank settlement or Ariel that "ariel must expand, it needs more schools, swimming pools, houses, couples."

Mr. Netanyahu's right-wing government in June lifted a freeze on settlement expansion imposed by the previous government and has since approved plans for building thousands of homes in the West Bank.

"French authorities are convinced that peace and security in the Middle East cannot be forged without respecting the accords already reached," Mr. Rummelhardt continued.

"It wants to believe that the Israeli government, which has said it is ready to press ahead with the peace process, will stick to their commitments," he said.

Mr. Netanyahu is to meet President Jacques Chirac on Monday during the organisation for security and cooperation in Europe (OSCE) summit in Lisbon.

The United States has also criticised the Israeli premier's comments, calling them "not useful and not constructive."

A senior U.S. official commented on the visit Mr. Netanyahu made to Ariel, the settlements "a very complicating factor" in the peace process.

The visit, he added, was "not useful."

"It's not constructive," the senior U.S. official said.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Musa said the U.N. General Assembly will soon discuss a resolution concerning Israel's settlement policy in the Palestinian territories.

Arafat and Jewish settlers discuss coexistence in Bethlehem meeting

OCCUPIED JERUSALEM (AP) — A group of Jewish settlers met with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat in the autonomous city of Bethlehem to discuss coexistence, Israeli participants and Palestinian officials said Wednesday.

The Tuesday night meeting came as Palestinian and Israeli negotiators struggled to reach an agreement that would allow Israel to carry out its long-delayed pull-back in the West Bank town of Hebron, home to some 450 Jewish settlers and 130,000 Palestinians.

The question of how to prevent friction between the two communities, which include some of the most militant Jews and Palestinians in the West Bank, has been the focus of much of the two months of negotiations.

An official close to Mr. Arafat, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed the meeting took place. The official said the Palestinians were "not enthusiastic" about the contact and refused to give details of the meeting.

Jewish settlers from Hebron and the nearby settlement of Kiryat Arba were among the group of 12 who met with Mr. Arafat late Tuesday night, said David Bedein of the West Bank settlement of Efrat who participated in the meeting.

Mr. Arafat shook everyone's hand and served orange juice and coffee during the 90-minute meeting that Mr. Bedein described as "cordial and businesslike."

"There was no antagonism, but it was not a love fest," said Mr. Bedein.

Mr. Bedein said the settlers requested the meeting with Mr. Arafat after Palestinian merchants put off business deals with Israelis pending approval from the Palestinian leader.

Mr. Arafat appointed a liaison between Jewish businessmen and the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) to act as a go-between for such contacts including use of a Palestinian bus company for an Israeli tour of the town of Hebron, Mr. Bedein said.

Yehuda Waxman, an Israeli who was also present at the meeting, said the group also "discussed ways of coexistence between the Jews and the Arabs in area" with Mr. Arafat.

"We asked whether Arafat was going to finally make speeches in Arabic in which he promotes coexistence with Israel," Mr. Bedein said. "He nodded his head and said I do so all the time."

Mr. Waxman, whose son Nachshon was kidnapped by militants two years ago and killed during a rescue attempt by Israeli commandos, also proposed that Mr. Arafat participate in a centre for tolerance he established in his son's name.

The Council of Jewish Settlers, which represents many of the 140,000 settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, said it opposed meeting with Mr. Arafat since the Palestinian leader calls for dismantling all settlements.

Tsuril Popovich, spokesman for Kiryat Arba where 6,000 settlers live, criticised the meeting.

"We didn't approve of the prime minister meeting Arafat, so we're certainly not going to approve of our own residents meeting him," Mr. Popovich said.

It was agreed by both sides with (the) acknowledgment and the participation of the United States as a major co-sponsor that in any peace agreement Israel should withdraw fully from the Golan to the 4th of June, 1967 lines," he said.

That done, Syria was willing to conduct more substantive talks, and reach agreement with Israel on security arrangements.

Mr. Sharaa would not say what these were, but the assassinated Israeli prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, had suggested a withdrawal of Syrian forces to 20 kilometres from the Heights, and the presence of international peacekeepers on the Heights.

"It is recorded, thousands of pages of minutes of meetings, messages, letters signed, etc.," the Syrian foreign minister said. There was no signed agreement, he said, because both sides preferred to wait until a final peace was negotiated before signing.

Mr. Sharaa's press conference was the first time a Syrian confirmed the report,

Curb the urge to shop — group

VANCOUVER, British Columbia (R) — Fed up with over-the-top commercialisation of Christmas? Here's a novel way to mark the beginning of the holiday shopping season: for just one day, buy absolutely nothing. "Buy Nothing Day," organised by a loose coalition of international groups, will be held on Nov. 29, the day after America's Thanksgiving and the unofficial start of the Christmas and Chanukah gift-buying rush. It is usually one of the busiest shopping days of the year. "The concept is a 24-hour moratorium on consumer spending," said Kalle Lasn, director of the Vancouver-based Media Foundation, one of the event's backers. Buy Nothing Day's organisers hope more than 100,000 people in the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the Netherlands, Britain, South Africa, Japan, Sweden and Belgium will fight off the urge to buy. Started by a Canadian group five years ago, the day aims to draw attention to overconsumption and its environmental and social consequences.
